It is understood that the Department of Communications has decided in favour of allowing foreigners to become shareholders in Japanese railway companies, and that the opinion of the Cabinet has now to be expressed on the subject. So, at least, we interpret the matter, though, according to vernacular newspapers, the exact question propounded to the Department was whether certain companies might raise a foreign loan. The Department's decision, even if endorsed by the Cabinet, will scarcely bring the companies much nearer to their desired goal. Foreign capitalists are not likely to be greatly tempted by the privilege of holding shares in Japanese railways. They can do that now if they please, for whether the transaction be strictly legal or not, there is little difficulty in contriving it. Besides, the kind of security they require is not shares. Of what value is a share unless there is a reasonable certainty that the railway will continue to be a live concern and that its affairs will be efficiently managed? The shares of a badly, or fraudulently, managed line might fall at any moment to a merely nominal figure in the market. Of course there are debentures. Debentures carrying fixed interest, conferring a preference title and empowering their holders to sell up the Company's property in case of default, might tempt some foreign speculators or investors. But do the Japanese really imagine that they can obtain cheap money in that way? They are mistaken, if they do, we think. The credit of all Japanese enterprises will have to reach a point much higher than it has yet attained before they attract foreign capital. Under existing circumstances, there must be a certainty of a substantial return and there must also be a distinctly promising speculative element. Foreigners will buy debentures, first, if they can be well convinced as to the quality of the security, and secondly if they can see a reasonable prospect of selling out by-and-by at a good premium. As a mere investment most people would consider it far safer to lodge their money at 7 per cent. in the Mitsubishi or Mitsui Banks than to lend it to a railway company. There is only one way of obtaining cheap money at present, namely, to develop the national credit; and before attempting anything of that kind, the State's finances must be placed on a sound basis. So far as foreigners can see, Japan is now living in a veritable hand-to-mouth fashion. She is shirking the situation, and drawing upon the Indemnity when her accounts will not balance. On the day when she makes up her mind definitely to increase the Land Tax and the Sake Tax so as to secure an addition of 40 million yen at least to her annual income, on that day she will have no difficulty in getting money in England at 4 per cent.

HAWAII AND SHASI.

Almost simultaneously with the receipt of the news that the Hawaiian complication has been settled, comes intelligence that China has agreed to Japan's terms about the Shasi outrage. In the case of Hawaii there has been a compromise, as there always is in the monetary arrangements between two States. Japan asked for two hundred and fifty thousand yen—we are not sure of the figure—and she receives a hundred and fifty thousand. It may be mentioned here that some of the vernacular journals are casting about for an explanation of the fact that Hawaii has suddenly abandoned her obdurate mood and made due compensation to Japan. But surely the explanation is simple enough. The Government at Washington intimated to Hawaii that the settlement of Japan's claim was a desirable preliminary to annexation, and so it was settled. With regard to Shasi, although the affair is said to have been settled only two conditions appear to have been required by Japan—namely, a payment of 15,000 yen by way of compensation for property destroyed, and a pledge on China's part that she will defray half the cost of the new embankment, the construction of which is considered necessary for improving the water-front facilities of the place. It is said that some minor points are still under discussion, but there can be no doubt that Japan's terms have been as conspicuous for moderation as those of some other Powers have been remarkable for extravagance.

A COSTLY GRIEVANCE.

A correspondent, "British subject," suggests that the Government should prove its goodwill towards foreigners by allowing them to tender direct for State contracts. We presume that the original deterrent in this matter was a question of jurisdiction. The Government preferred to be able to sue for possible breaches of contract in its own courts. It is easy to recall two cases which must have helped greatly to suggest the present restrictions. A British subject was concerned in one of them; a German in the other. They were gory cases, however, not belonging to the category that occupies our correspondent's attention. He points out that ample security has to be given by persons undertaking contracts to supply goods for the State, and that the result of the existing system is simply to make the country pay a great deal more than it need for getting its business done. The matter is well worth considering, for our correspondent is a solid, sober, fair-minded merchant, not at all tinged with anti-Japanese prejudice, and thoroughly competent to speak authoritatively on such a topic.

COTTON SPINNING COMPANIES.

We have alluded more than once to the evil days that have overtaken the cotton-spinning companies. Until the beginning of the present year, their business was sufficiently prosperous, but the troublous state of affairs in the Far East injured their exports on commission, and whereas the rapid rise in the prices of commodities greatly increased their running expenses, there was, at the same time, a fall in the market quotations for their productions, so that a bale of No. 16 count sold for only 85.34 yen at the end of June against 96.23 yen at the corresponding period last year. The effect of these various causes acting conjointly is very plainly shown in the following table—which we take from the Keisai Zasshi—showing the dividends for the first half of the present year as compared with the dividends for the second half of last year:—

We recently reported that three cotton spinning companies, the Hirano, the Settsu and the Okayama, had appointed a committee to consider a scheme of amalgamation, and also to determine whether by closing the mills at night, or reducing the working hours, the output might not be diminished so as to affect the market advantageously. It is now stated that such expedients offer no hopeful prospect. The hard fact is that the price of cotton yarns for export is less than the cost of production. Three hundred and fifty catties of cotton, at 18.50 yen per picul, represent 66.60 yen, and the labour, etc., of converting that amount into yarn amounts to 18 yen. Deducting 2 yen on account of waste cotton, the final cost is 82.60 yen, whereas the price for export is only 82.50 yen. The margin is on the wrong side. Nothing seems to offer, therefore, except a struggle for the survival of the fittest. The enterprise has been overdone.

The companies themselves, however, do not take such a gloomy view of their prospects. The committee appointed by them has formulated its recommendations. They are that all the cotton-spinning factories throughout the empire should form a union, and agree to close their mills for four days in the month, instead of two days as at present. The calculation is that one spindle produces 110 momme of yarn in 24 hours, and as there are 1,100,000 spindles in the empire, their stoppage for twenty-four hours would mean a diminution of production to the extent of 121,000 kwan (1,009,333 lbs.) or 2,520 bales, and their stoppage for 48 hours would reduce the stock of cotton yarns coming into the market by 5,040 bales per month or over 60,000 bales a year. It is believed that such a diminution would suffice to restore the price to a paying figure. The Committee proposes that the change should come into operation from October 1st. It will be a difficult matter, we imagine, to get all the companies to join such a union.

FORMOSA.

There appears to be no doubt that the rebels in northern Formosa are making act of submission. On the 26th ultimo, a ceremony of swearing allegiance took place in the neighbourhood of Gilan. Three hundred having sued for pardon, the Governor-General entertained their application and sent Mr. Goto Shimpei, Chief of the Civil Administration, to receive their submission and their oath of allegiance. Their leaders are reported to have made a strange statement. They said that they had never been turbulent citizens while the island was under Chinese rule, but that when it passed into Japanese hands, they were falsely represented as insurgents or bandits, and thus found themselves driven to courses which they would never have adopted of their own choice. That story, it must be confessed, has not the disadvantage of being specious.

The example of the Gilan insurgents was followed by a still larger number at Naizan, on the 10th instant. Three leaders in that district having applied for pardon, they, together with 1,230 of their followers, were duly sworn back into respectability. The telegram announcing the latter event, adds that these acts of submission have produced an excellent feeling of security among the people. Our readers will understand that the "insurgents" (dohi) here spoken of are not the so-called "savages" (seiban) of Formosa. They are the lawless Chinese settlers who have been causing so much trouble.

It does really appear that the policy of the new Governor-General in Formosa has had an excellent effect. Another voluntary submission on the part of three insurgent leaders and their followers is telegraphically reported from Taipeh, under date of the 16th instant, and the telegram adds that all elements of insurrection in the northern portions of the Island are now completely disposed of. If that estimate be confirmed by events, Baron Kodama will deserve public thanks.

A NEW NEWSPAPER.

It is announced that a new daily journal will be published in Tokyo from the 1st prox., under the name Kaikoku Shimbun. The interesting point about this paper is that it will be the organ of Viscount Aoki, formerly Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, and recently Japanese Representative in Berlin. We may therefore regard it as an addition to the very best class of Japanese journals.

A DEATH AND A BIRTH.

The Far East will cease to exist at the end of the current month, and its able editor, Mr. Fukai, will devote himself to the charge of an English section which is to be added to the Kokumin Shimbun. This, indeed, is not the only change of programme announced by the proprietors of the Kokumin Shimbun. They are also about to give up the publication of the Kokumin no Tomo and the Katei Zasshi. Both of these are periodicals printed in the Japanese language, and both are monthly magazines brought out chiefly by the staff of the Kokumin Shimbun. The Kokumin no Tomo is essentially a publication for the highly educated classes; the Katei Zasshi, a domestic magazine for ladies. It is announced that the industry and research hitherto devoted to the three magazines will now be diverted to the improvement of the Kokumin Shimbun, which will have two columns daily of articles and notes in English, and will be greatly developed in other respects. We can not but regret the demise of the Far East. It was an excellently edited magazine, and it served to give the foreign public a good insight into the tendency of Japanese thought. But we always had our doubts about the possibility of its success from a financial point of view. It could not hope to find many readers outside the foreign communities at the open ports, and with such a limited clientèle the proprietors of a magazine can not afford to sell it for six-pence a number. When one reflects that the four communities of Tokyo, Yokohama, Kobe and Nagasaki support no less than eleven newspapers or periodicals printed in English, the wonder is, not that some difficulty is experienced in finding room for more, but that so many can eke out an existence, however meagre. They do it, of course, by charging prices largely in excess of the standard ruling in England. The Far East attempted to be more moderate, and found that ends would not meet. We have reason to think that the Hansei Zasshi, another very attractive English periodical edited by Japanese—not, indeed, standing on the same plane as the Far East, but still an interesting and instructive magazine—could not exist without the support it receives from a Buddhist source. The English-reading public will gain, in some respects, by the substitution of two columns daily in the Kokumin Shimbun for the monthly issues of the Far East. Current topics can thus be discussed while their interest is fresher. But of course there will be no space for the long, thoughtful essays that appeared in the pages of the Far East. We predict that this new venture will be something very different from the wonderful productions that now electrify us from time to time in the columns of the Yorozu Choho.

CHINA'S AMBASSADORS.

Some curiosity is naturally aroused by the announcement that China is about to despatch three ambassadors, one to Japan and America, one to England and France, and one to Germany and Russia. Some political prophets are disposed to attribute to the Peking Government an intention to seek new combinations, but the shrewder conjecture is that, in view of her financial troubles, China intends to approach the Powers with a proposal for the revision of her import tariff. Perhaps Japan's success in that direction has inspired hopes in her neighbour's breast. But China will have to buy every concession she obtains from the Continental Powers of Europe, and with what coin is she to effect the purchase?

THE CHINESE LEGATION IN TOKYO.

The period of service of the present Chinese Representative in Tokyo having terminated, Mr. Hoang Tsunshen has been appointed to succeed him. Mr. Hoang was formerly nominated as Chinese Minister to Berlin, but Germany raised objections to receiving him, and he did not take up the post. There does not exist, we believe, any understanding between the Governments of Japan and China for reciprocal consultation with regard to the persons of Ministers, but, under any circumstances, Japan would doubtless welcome Mr. Hoang, as he is among the most prominent advocates of progress in China. He served formerly in Japan as Secretary of Legation and subsequently as Consul-General in America, and he is said to have an intimate knowledge of the English language.

THE KYOBASHI HOTCH-POTCH.

The curiosities growing out of the election complication in the Fourth District of Tokyo have not come to an end. Two citizens of the District are now said to have instituted proceedings against Mr. Yamada (the successful candidate) for the crime of using spurious documents, and Mr. Yamada has instituted proceedings against Mr. Tsuchida for false accusation. It is really worth while to draw up a little table of the suits and countersuits to which this affair has given rise:—

1. Followers of Mr. Yamada lodge information against followers of Mr. Nakazawa for violating the Urgency Ordinance by giving refreshments at the tea-and-talk réunion.

2. Mr. Tsuchida lodges information against 199 of his own political friends, Mr. Nakazawa's supporters, for making fraudulent use of his name.

3. Mr. Tsuchida withdraws his accusation, alleging that he made it under the influence of intimidation on the part of Mr. Yamada, and lays information against Mr. Yamada for violating the Urgency Ordinance by using threats to electors.

4. Citizens of the District, friends of Mr. Nakazawa, charge Mr. Yamada's supporters with forging the name of Mr. Sewaki.

5. Citizens of the District, friends of Mr. Nakazawa, lodge information against Mr. Yamada for making fraudulent use of names.

6. Mr. Yamada institutes proceedings against Mr. Tsuchida for false accusation.

It is tangled web, in truth, and if the law officers manage to unravel it without breaking something—their own reputation or Mr. Yamada's—they will deserve much credit.

THE "YAMATO" IN THE TYPHOON.

The Yamato seems to have had a rough time from the 6th to the 9th instant. She left Kelung on the 4th for Oshima, and on the 6th met the full force of the typhoon, which, instead of visiting us in Japan turned in its tracks from the Riukiu Islands, and, sweeping past the north-west of Formosa, invaded China somewhere in the neighbourhood of Ningpo. The Yamato is said to have drifted for three days, crossing the route of the storm, and finally, on the 9th instant, she made the entrance of the Min River, whence she returned to Kelung on the 11th. She suffered some damage, and will have to be docked at Sasebo for repairs. The Yamato is one of the small vessels of the Japanese Navy, being a composite sloop of 1,502 tons.

THE GERMANS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Probably we shall never know the precise facts of the recently reported German interference at the Philippines. Our own correspondent has been denounced for sending us incorrect news, and very explicit statements have been published to the effect that the German Admiral did not in the smallest degree overstep the bounds of strict neutrality. We ourselves are persuaded that he did not, but that he placed himself in circumstances calculated to create false impressions. At any rate, as much for the sake of vindicating the accuracy of our correspondent as because of the interest attaching to all the details, we reproduce the following, from The Times of July 14th:—

New York, July 13.

The special correspondent of the Associated Press with Rear-Admiral Dewey's squadron at Manila, in a despatch dated the 9th inst., says:—

"The Governor-General has issued a proclamation promising autonomy and offering inducements to the rebels to join the Spanish forces, but Aguinaldo replied that these overtures came too late.

"On Wednesday last the insurgents reported that the German cruiser Irene in Subig Bay refused to allow them to attack the Spaniards on Isla Grande. Rear-Admiral Dewey despatched the Raleigh and Concord thither to investigate the matter. On entering Subig Bay the Raleigh opened fire on the forts, whereupon the Irene slipped her cable and steamed out by the other channel.

"In response to the American fire, the Spanish force, numbering over 509, surrendered everything.

"On entering here the captain of the Irene explained that he had interfered in the cause of humanity, and offered to turn over to the Americans the refugees he had on board, but Rear-Admiral Dewey declined the offer."

LATER.

Rear-Admiral Dewey's report confirms the intelligence published here to-day that the German cruiser Irene prevented Aguinaldo from taking Isla Grande, after he had taken the rest of Subig Bay, and that the Irene retired when the Raleigh and Concord arrived.

MRS. HUGH FRASER.

Many in Japan read "Palladia," with great delight. It was a beautiful story daintily told, and to not a few who number among the privileges of their Far Eastern exile that of being on the list of Mrs. Hugh Fraser's intimate friends, the book possessed considerable attractions apart from its striking literary workmanship. We have not yet had the pleasure of perusing her latest work, "The Looms of Time," but we learn from The Saturday Review that it disappoints one who has read "Palladia," for it is said to have not one-tenth of "Palladia's" brilliancy or originality. "It is simply a good average novel, with a little shipboard flirtation, a little lover's misunderstanding of the ordinary kind, and, finally, a little buried treasure and a villain to supply a little violence. All this would do well enough, no doubt, for the skeleton of a fine novel if the treatment were strong. Here the treatment is commonplace, and it would show little appreciation of Mrs. Hugh Fraser to affect to class 'The Looms of Time' among her best work."

The Bangkok Times says that the cost of a modern mint has been conceded in Siam, and new machinery is to be ordered in London.

ENGLAND IN THE FAR EAST.

MR. BALFOUR'S statement in the House of Commons in reply to an interpellation by Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, has been taken by the Japan Times as the text of a leading article which, since it comes from a Japanese pen, invites comment. We are not aware by what process or under whose direction the headings of the telegrams published by the Japan Times are evolved, but they certainly tend to give a great deal of needless offence to foreigners residing in Japan. Thus the telegram containing Mr. BALFOUR'S statement is headed "Feeble defence by Mr. Balfour; a shop-keeping policy." It is an old and now rather hackneyed reproach to call the English "a nation of shop-keepers." The epithet is of course meant to be insulting, but the insult loses its sting when we observe that nearly all other nations are strenuously endeavouring to adopt the very methods which they have hitherto been pleased to regard as evidence of Englands' mercantile propensities. Still the intention to say an unpleasant thing remains, and is especially evident in the case to which we allude, for the term "a shop-keeping policy" does not in any way apply to Mr. BALFOUR'S statement of the British Government's views. Its use is therefore ungraceful and discourteous. However, grace and courtesy can not be exacted, and Englishmen do not feel seriously distressed because their critics lack those qualities.

What Mr. BALFOUR is reported to have said was this:—

> It could not be pretended that this Empire either alone or in alliance with another Empire could prevent the legitimate development of other commercial military empires. Though England may not anticipate maintaining her old relative superiority in China, it may be expected that the volume of trade will increase as rapidly in the future as it had done in the past. The question of trade was distinct from the question of concessions. No evidence, he added, existed of any intention to erect barriers against British goods. He saw no necessity to take a pessimist view with regard to Russia, and he would be surprised if English concessionaires did not obtain their full share.

The Japan Times, commenting on the above, says:—

> With our readers we can imagine what a tremendous wave of disgust and indignation must have dashed over the whole of England at this latest confession of the invertebrate policy to which Lord Salisbury's Government appears to have unalterably committed itself. We fancy the great London dailies * * * raging over what they consider the decadence of English diplomacy, which has apparently degenerated into the practice of a multi-milionaire who allows himself to be blackmailed, hookwinked, and made the butt of general intrigue and conspiracy, and who though occasionally assuming an attitude of protest, even of menace, relapses, the next moment into one of conciliation and explanation towards his domestic and outside foes, a policy only likely to beget discontent at home and distrust and contempt abroad, while forgetting that he is all the while hurrying along the road to moral suicide.

We are among the readers of the telegrams forwarded to Japan by REUTER'S agents, and we assure our Tokyo contemporary that our bosom was not inundated by any "tremendous wave of disgust and indignation" when we perused Mr. BALFOUR'S speech. Mr. BALFOUR made six assertions: first, that England, whether acting alone or in concert, could not prevent the legitimate development of other commercial military empires; secondly, that though England could not, perhaps, look forward to maintaining her old relative superiority in China, still the volume of trade might be expected to increase with undiminished rapidity; thirdly, that the question of trade was distinct from the question of concessions; fourthly, that no evidence existed of an intention to erect a barrier against British goods; fifthly, that he saw no reason to take a pessimist view with regard to Russia, and sixthly, that he should be surprised if English concessionaires did not obtain their full share. To which of these assertions does the Japan Times take exception? Let us look at them briefly in order. Does the Japan Times think that England should set herself to prevent the legitimate development of other commercial empires because they happen to be also military Powers? If she has any such right, then surely they have a corresponding right, and the result would be a perpetual struggle between the nations of the world to place obstacles in the way of each other's commerce. England, we are proud to think, has never followed any such policy. Her rule has always been, a fair field and no favour. A bad day would indeed dawn for civilization if England undertook to "prevent the legitimate commercial development" of other States. Illegitimate development would be another matter, but "legitimate development" is within the natural right of every nation, though unfortunately the fact seems to be too often lost sight of by Great Britain's critics in the East. What appears to have specially astonished the Japan Times is Mr. BALFOUR'S second proposition, namely, that England "may not anticipate maintaining her old relative superiority in China," but that the volume of trade may be expected to increase as rapidly as ever. Our contemporary italicises the words "may not anticipate maintaining her old relative superiority in China," and separating them altogether from their context, interprets them to indicate a voluntary abdication on England's part of the leading place she has hitherto occupied in the Far East. Now although the telegram is somewhat clumsily expanded, no intelligent reader can entertain the smallest doubt as to its meaning. What Mr. BALFOUR said was that although England's share in China's foreign trade could not be expected to retain always the same vastly preponderating dimensions as it has hitherto shown, there was no apparent reason to doubt that its volume would continue to grow as rapidly as ever. There are two methods of considering commercial statistics: there is the method of ratios and the method of realities. The former may often prove very misleading. For example, out of a total trade of 100 million dollars, A may be doing 90 millions, the remainder falling to his rivals' share. Now suppose that the total trade grows to 150 millions, and that A does 120 millions, his rivals doing 30 millions. In the former case, A's trade was nine times as large as that of his rivals; in the latter, it is only four times as large. Moreover, while A's trade has increased by only one-third, the trade of his rivals has trebled. That looks a very bad record for A. But if we turn to realities, we find that the actual growth of A's trade has been 30 million dollars, whereas the actual growth of his rivals' trade has been only 20 millions. That is pretty much what is happening in the case of England. Formerly she enjoyed almost a monopoly of Far-Eastern trade. But of late years many rivals have cut in, and their record makes a brave showing when judged by the method of ratios. But, in the meanwhile, British trade grows steadily, nor can there be the smallest doubt that Englishmen profit amply by every development resulting from the energy and enterprise of other Powers. Mr. BALFOUR reminded the House of those facts. His words do not, in our ears, possess any ring of pusillanimity or self-effacement. The "relative superiority" to which he alluded was obviously limited to the field of commerce lying entirely beyond the range of a wise and civilized government's interference.

It is perhaps unnecessary to make any detailed reference to the other propositions advanced by Mr. BALFOUR. Stated simply, as we have stated them, they are not open to criticism or misinterpretation. Mr. BALFOUR'S object was evidently to establish a necessary distinction between British trade, in the general sense of the term, and the special concessions for the construction of railways which now occupy such a prominent place in public attention. It has been the honorable rule of the British Government to abstain from employing the powers of the State in the interests of individuals. Anything like unfair differentiation against British subjects in general, is always resolutely resisted, and will never be tolerated so long as England's arm retains its strength. But when there is question of some special piece of work open to public competition, British diplomats and British Ministers do not exercise their influence to secure an advantage for this British subject or for that. Of late, that wholesome principle has not been observed by other Powers. They do not hesitate to employ the authority and prestige of the State in the cause of individual traders, individual manufacturers, and individual capitalists; their theory being that since the State's resources are strengthened by the aggregate of such enterprises, it is proper that official energy should be applied to promote them in detail. Without pausing to discuss the morality of such a doctrine or the results that it must inevitably entail if universally adopted, we desire to point out that its application to China's case by certain Powers has created a situation not only novel but also requiring the most delicate manipulation on Great Britain's part. It would be easy for her to enter the scramble, wielding the same weapons of diplomatic pressure and veiled menace that her rivals have begun to employ. There can be no doubt about the issue. England is incomparably the strongest Power in the Far East, and her strength, if applied in such a manner, would bear full fruit. But what would be the consequence for China? One of two things—either she would have to throw herself entirely into England's arms, giving to British subjects everything that she has to give in the way of industrial and commercial concessions; or she would have to submit to the partition of her empire into "spheres of foreign influence," each Western Power enjoying a monopoly within its own particular sphere. The second of these alternatives is the one to be certainly anticipated. But it is also exactly the issue which Great Britain desires to avert. She desires to avert the partition of China, and the partition of China would become virtually an accomplished fact from the moment that England entered the arena into which certain European Powers have allowed themselves to descend. Under the circumstances the British Government has adopted the only honorable and dignified course. It has officially intimated to China that she may count upon British protection against any attempts made by other Powers to coerce her into making tradal or industrial discriminations in their favour. In effect, Lord SALISBURY has informed China that the lists shall be held for her by British strength, and that the enjoyment of free trade is guaranteed to her by Great Britain. No one can be blind to the perils of the situation. The Powers seem to be gradually getting involved in the meshes of complications from which they will ultimately have to cut their way with the edge of the sword. But it will be possible for Englishmen in that day to say that no effort was spared by the QUEEN'S Government to prevent the calamity, and that from first to last England treated these complications with dignified patience and honorable impartiality, not resorting to the menaces which her strength forbids her to use lightly, or stooping to any of the manœuvres which would at once secure to her a lion's share of ill-gotten gains. It is because she pursues this straight, honest course that her people are entirely confident in the result, and not greatly concerned if hasty critics mistake her temperance for pusillanimity and her stern self-restraint for invertebrate hesitation.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Shinseiki reviews a "Commentary on Genesis," recently published by the Rev. T. M. MacNair. The work is issued by the Kyōbunkan, Ginza, Tōkyō. There are, says the Shinseiki, Mr. Takahashi Gorō's and Mr. Wadman's Commentaries on Genesis, and one or two others besides, but for minuteness there is no book in Japanese to be compared to Mr. MacNair's volume. The work is the result of several years investigation and study. The only cause for regret, continues the Shinseiki, is that Mr. MacNair has not adopted or discussed the views of the new school of critics as regards the literary and theological standpoint of Genesis and its authorship. In this respect the work is not up to date. Theology in Japan is neither ultra-conservative nor ultra-liberal. While holding fast to the essential truths of the Gospel, it is desirous of embodying the results of what is known as advanced criticism. Among scholarly critics those who still hold to the opinion that Moses was the author of Genesis are very few. It is not only the German school of critics that has rejected this view, but a large section of theologians in England as well. Then as regards the reconciliation of the cosmogony of Genesis with modern science, this is a subject on which modern commentators are called upon to express an opinion. The theory connected with the length of the creation day referred to at the beginning of the book needs discussing. The old idea that it embraced long periods of years is now no longer entertained and it is considered preferable to take the word "day" in its literal sense as referring to a 24-hour period. But this and similar questions are not discussed by Mr. MacNair. Mr. MacNair would doubtless say that, his object being to show what is the religious teaching of Genesis, he was not concerned with critical questions, but the Shinseiki thinks that in this critical age it is impossible to ignore such topics.

The Asahi Shimbun, a short time ago, published an interesting account of Bishop Nicolai, in which it is stated that the learned prelate has been labouring in Japan 35 years, first at Hakodate and subsequently in Tōkyō. He is said to be a man that enjoys the most perfect health and is able to work from 4 in the morning to 11 at night. There is no subject connected with Japanese life and thought that he has not studied. Shintō, Buddhism and Confucianism have all received minute attention. Three or four years ago he was offered a post which would have made him the head of the Greek Churches in Siberia, China and Japan, but he resolutely refused to accept any responsibility or honour which would involve separation from his Japanese flock. To be a Bishop of the church which he had laboured to found satisfied all his desires. The Asahi is full of admiration for the character of this devoted disciple of Christ.

The Rev. Dr. M. C. Harris, who for many years laboured as a Methodist Missionory in Hakodate and subsequently founded and took charge of a Japanese church in San Francisco, has been paying a visit to Japan and speaking and preaching in various parts. The Japanese papers speak of him as a venerable old gentleman who has nearly reached the limit of his days. But this is a mistake. Dr. Harris is certainly nearer 50 than 60. The Kokumin Shimbun furnishes a report of Dr. Harris' address at a Church situated at the top of Kudan, Tōkyō, from which we cull the following:—Dr. Harris said that though he would like to live in Japan, he felt that duty called him elsewhere. In Hawaii there were some 30,000 Japanese and on the Pacific Coast of America 10,000 more. Among these his labours were carried on. He then alluded to Mr. Gladstone and said that his greatness was principally derived from his religion. Without God men knew neither how to live nor how to die. . . He regarded Japan as one of the most beautiful of countries—the garden of the Lord. . . He first came to the country in 1873 and left it in 1886. In the 12 years during which he was absent Japan had made rapid strides. In his opinion the real cause of Japan's progress was the earnestness of her young men. Even before Commodore Perry arrived there existed a party of enthusiasts who were striving after a higher ideal. Perry did no more than create an opportunity for the realisation of the hopes of would-be reformers.

Mr. Nishimura Shigeki a short time ago delivered a lecture on "Concubinage" to the members of the Gakushikai-in, which attracted considerable attention. We give a short abstract of the lecture:—Polygamy and concubinage prevail throughout the East. As far as Japan is concerned the practice was controlled, though not originally introduced, by the observations bearing thereon to be found in the Chinese Classics. In the 禮記 Lei-Ki the conjugal arrangements allowed are as follows:—An Emperor is allowed to have 3 consorts (后 Kō), 9 maids of high rank called 夫人* taifu, 27 maids of lower rank called 正婦, seifu, and 81 females called 女妾, joshō, or concubines. The taifu and seifu were wives, ranking beneath the queens. In an old book we read of Tei-kok having 4 wives, of U having 9 wives, and of 39 being allowed in the Yan period, and 120 in the Tsun era [B.C. 203-221]. Concubinage and polygamy being thus sanctioned by the classics, it became an established custom in Japan. Even in the Shinritsu-Kōryō, a new digest of laws published in 1870, the concubine is ranked among relations of the second grade; she occupies a position next to the wife. The subject has attracted little general attention till recently, though it is true that Mr. Fukuzawa Yūkichi many years ago denounced the practice of concubinage. In Europe the objection to concubinage was principally derived from Christianity, though non-Christian philosophers are equally opposed to the practice. Oriental ethics are in every way inferior to Occidental ethics in the matter of concubinage and its attendant evils. In very early times intercourse between the sexes among human beings was in every case promiscuous and differed nothing from what we see among animals at present. The next stage was for the powerful among mankind to keep a number of women for their exclusive use. But in certain Eastern countries ancestral worship and the importance attached to blood relationship gave a sanction to concubinage of an apparently unselfish type. The importance of continuing the family line was considered sufficient to warrant the begetting of children by means of other women when the wife was childless. In the case of marriage resulting in no issue, even now, says Mr. Nishimura, I see no objection to the practice of concubinage. But in all cases where no such excuse can be pleaded the practice should be abolished. In not a few instances the existence of concubines in the house is the real cause of the wife's bearing no children. Where there are children by both the wife and concubines, family relationships are in many cases anything but cordial. The excuses for the practice are idle excuses. Its attendant evils enormously outweigh any benefit derived therefrom. As regards the continuance of the family line and name and ancestral worship, brothers or even nephews can perform this office in the absence of offspring.

* It is doubtless true that the term fu indicates that the woman possessing this title was raised to a higher level than that of an ordinary concubine though we observe that certain writers translate it by "concubine." The fu was a wife, despite the fact that other wives existed.—(Writer of the Summary).

The Fukuin Shimpō complains of the persistency with which the majority of Japanese place the responsibilty of living moral lives on the shoulders of religious professors. In the old fendal days anything that went wrong in the country was ascribed to government neglect. The mass of the people took no interest in the conduct of public affairs. In the matter of morality, this is precisely the position now. A Christian's strictness of behaviour is deemed right and proper, but non-Christians and men professing no religion whatever consider it their right to act as they please.

At the Nihon Kirisutokyō Seinen Gakusei Dōmei-daikai, held at Hayama, Sōshū, Mr. Uemura Masahisa, delivered an address the purport of which we give below:—One of the leading characteristics of Japanese Christianity at the present time is its shallowness. Religious feeling and religious thought of any depth are very rare. There are those who lay stress on experience alone, and think it matters little whether religious devotees are able to argue or not. But in my opinion there is great need for persons who are able to state the reasons for their belief. The constant shifting from one stage of belief to another witnessed to-day is caused by the extreme superficiality of the religious views of many Japanese Christians. It is desirable to take a broad and comprehensive view of religion and not to concentrate attention on one or two points or doctrines. The Bible must be studied as it stands, and students should not approach it as idea-hunters. There are facts on which stress is to be laid which are quite independent of the ideas attached to them. Such is sin, the atonement and the character of Christ. The shallowness of our Christianity reveals itself in the hymns used in our churches What Christian experience has been embodied in verse that will bear comparison with the standard hymns used in Western Churches? Our leading Christians, such men as Messrs. Honda, and Ishikawa dwell more on the benefits to be derived from the spread of Christianity than on the superiority of the Christian life. Christianity is represented by them as a great reforming machine, as a military weapon wherewith they hope to slay their enemies or as an asylum for the poor, the oppressed, and the bereaved. They dwell rather on the uses to which Christianity is to be put than on its inherent power and claims to acceptance. As Christians we are only children playing on the shore in sight of the ocean of boundless truth.

From information published in the Kirisutokyō Shimbun bearing on the Dōshisha affair, we gather that no decisive action beyond protest can be taken by the large number of Christians who disapprove of the conduct of the Trustees. The dissentients are represented by Messrs. Ibuka, Honda, Tagawa, Tsuda, Uyemura, Motoda, and Serata. These gentlemen, acting on instructions received at a large gathering of Christians held on March 26th, denounced the action of the Trustees as a breach of faith, and as contrary to reason and morality. But this expression of opinion had no effect and there the matter has had to drop.

The organ quoted above reports an address delivered to the Kōjimachi Ichibanchō Church by Mr. Tokutomi Iichirō on "Woman's Virtue," in which he says that humility, delicacy, and common sense are the most important qualities to be cultivated in women. He regards women as the peacemakers of the world. Mr. Gladstone is quoted as saying "woman's heart is the temple of peace." Mr. Tokutomi is of opinion that the production of a number of forward girls, known in Japan as otemba, is a natural result of the line pursued by educationists in recent years, and he argues that the teaching of the Onna Daigaku, needs to be reintroduced in female society. The world is full of strife and friction; woman's mission is to pour oil on the troubled waters, to comfort and to soothe, and in order to do this effectually, she needs to possess the traits mentioned above.

It is stated by Mr. Katayama Hisomu that the American contributors to the Dōshisha intend bringing an action against the Trustees for misappropriation of money entrusted to them. In a court of law the Japanese, led by Mr. Miyoshi, the late President of the Supreme Court, are likely to win, but the expenses involved will be considerable and the case if brought on will cause great odium and seriously disturb the relations of Japanese with foreigners. In one or two other publications there are allusions to the subject, but the excitement shows signs of dying away. There is no indication of any disposition to relent on the part of the trustees, and in the absence of legal action it is considered useless to discuss the subject further.

In Mr. Hara Kei's book on the "Operation of the New Treaties," noticed in the last Summary of Japanese Current Literature published in these columns, the effect of the new treaties on missionary work is discussed. The author says that in some quarters it is recommended that the rules now applied to Buddhist and Shintō priests should be enforced in the case of Christian Missionaries. Mr. Hara hopes that no such course will be adopted. Many of these rules are needlessly irksome. The Constitution grants freedom of belief and every effort should be made to make this provision something more than a dead letter. As long as Christian Missionaries obey the laws of the land, they should not be interfered with in their work. Many of the rules concerning Buddhism and Shintō are utterly useless and fail to prevent the weaknesses and shortcomings of the teachers of these creeds from being felt. The principle of non-interference should be strictly adhered to by the Government. The law that the fittest survives will work itself out in the matter of religion if only allowed free scope.

The Shinseiki has articles on "Theology and Faith," by Mr. Kosaki; "The Present position of Japan," by Mr. Tagawa; "Past and Present Theories on the Atonement," by Mr. Motoda; "The Present State of New Testament Criticism," by Rev. Geo. E. Albrecht; and "How far is Science Authoritative?" by Mr. Imaizumi.

The following item is quoted by the Shinseiki from the Jiji Shimpō:—During the past few months a large increase of applications for admission to mission schools are reported. This is supposed to be caused by the near approach of mixed residence.

The Shinri has celebrated the appearance of its hundredth number, says the Shinseiki. The magazine has undoubtedly benefited, certain classes of Christians, but we regret that its policy is negative. In the establishment of the kingdom of Christ in Japan positive teaching is absolutely necessary.

It is alleged that the action of the Dōshisha and the similar action of a body of Christians in Kumamoto have so alienated the minds of Christians in America that considerable reluctance to send missionaries to Japan is felt in certain quarters. This is greatly to be regretted from all points of view, says the Shinseiki.

Among a number of useful articles published in the Rikugō Zasshi, one on "Partisanship and Sectarianism," by the Editor, contains some wholesome truths. After tracing the evils of partisanship in politics the writer proceeds to remark that party spirit is greatly intensified in religious sects. The malice they bear to each other in many instances exceeds anything witnessed in the political world. While proclaiming from their pulpits brotherly love and universal charity, members of the orthodox party treat Confucianists with greater consideration than they display towards Christians who deny miracles, the Divinity of Christ, and the doctrine of the Trinity. It is quite plain that true Christian sentiment is not in their midst. The unsectarian spirit shown by the Kumiai churches and Nihon Kirisuto-Kyōkai has done much, and will, if it continues, do more to spread Christianity than any other influence. The combination of political parties which has taken place recently should be followed by a movement in favour of closer union among Christians.

Another editorial in the magazine quoted above deals with methods of preaching Christianity and with the state of Christian Churches. The writer complains of the great worldliness that characterises so many Christian bodies. He says that too frequently wealth and worldly influence rather than loyalty to the Christian cause are sought after, and that numbers are rated above quality. There is too much preaching of doctrines and dogmas and too little display of the inner life and moral superiority of the creed.

A third editorial takes up the subject of the attitude of religion to art and literature. The conclusion that the writer reaches is that in the Christian Church there is a widespread indifference to both. The missionaries are, according to this authority, responsible for this state of things, many of whom are either men of little education or mere priests who repeat prayers and go through services with all the perfunctoriness of a man in Buddhist orders who thinks that he has no concern with either art or literature. In Europe and America religous leaders invariably endeavour to permeate both art and literature with their ideas. In Japan, Christians occupy a little world of their own. They voluntarily cut themselves off from channels of influence which are utilised with great effect in other countries.

The Nichiyō Sōshi quotes from a report drawn up by the Rev. Henry Loomis, of Yokohama some statistics bearing upon missions that are of interest. According to this statement, the number of foreign Protestant missionsboards having missions in Japan are 34. The male missionaries connected with these societies are 232, and the female, 223, Reckoning the wives of missionaries, the number of workers is 652. Last year's report shows a decrease of 28 missionaries as compared with the report of the previous year. The number of sects represented is put at 22, and the churches established amount to 384. Of these, 72 are independent of foreign aid. The total number of converts is 40,578, being an increase of 2,216 over the previous year. The total amount of money subscribed for religious purposes was 81,551 yen 72 sen, being an increase of 10,947 yen 16 sen, over the previous year. The above statistics refer to the Protestant Churches only. The Roman Catholic report is as follows:—1 Archbishop; 3 Bishops, 98 Priests, 25 Friars; 88 Sisters; 244 Churches; 52,776 Christians. The Greek Church has one Bishop, 2 Priests, 168 Churches, 23,856 Christians, who subscribed during the year the sum of 5,658 yen.

The Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) dwells on the importance of Sunday schools in this country. The children of Christian parents who are baptised in infancy every year are growing to be more numerous. The parents or other sponsors promise that these children shall be taught religion and brought up in a Christian manner. But the parents are not always in a position to carry out this resolve, and the children, in the midst of non-Christian influences, are apt to grow up like unbaptised children. The instruction they receive at government schools is anti-Christian to a large extent. Hence, unless some attempt be made on the Sunday to bring Christianity to bear on them, their baptism will become a mere empty name. There are some who regard the establishment of Sunday schools as a mere device for filling up time, but it is rather to be viewed as one of the most important of the Church's duties.

The Seikyō Shimpō has something to say about the attempts of socialists and others to show that [illegible] preached by Christianity are unnecessary and even injurious. The argument used by the socialists is that with the establishment of communism there would be no more poor and hence no need of charity. According to their notion, the thousands who are now pinched by poverty have the right to demand a share of the property held by the rich, and to speak of anything given to them as charity is a misnomer. Economists take a different line of argument, but reach the some conclusion, namely that charity does more harm than good. Their reasoning is that in as far as men are helped so far do they become incapable of helping themselves; that charity destroys that spirit of independence which is so necessary to the development of character.† While admitting that taken in the abstract there may be some truth in these statements, the Seikyō Shimpō thinks that those who make them overlook certain facts connected with the human race, and that as a working theory the universal benevolence preached by Christ and exemplified by His life has not been surpassed. There is, after all, nothing to be compared to an all-embracing love, says this organ.

The Shakai Zasshi quotes from the Osaka Mainichi Shimbun the reproduction of an article contributed to an English Magazine by Dr. Maurice Eden Paul, of Nagasaki, on Japanese Social Development and its bearing on Western popular theories on the laws of development. We epitomise Dr. Paul's argument as given in the Shakai Zasshi:—European writers seem unconscious of the fact that in adopting Western civilisation Japan's mode of procedure has effectually exploded certain popular sociological theories. The place that Japan fills among progressive countries was not fully realised in Europe till after the China-Japan war. The easy victory which Japan obtained naturally drew the attention of thoughtful persons to the differences between the two nations. Leaving out of consideration for the moment Japan's adoption of Western civilisation, the two nations may be thus compared. In ethical notions and learning both bow to the teaching of Confucius, and there is little disagreement between them. In the idea of duty and obligation the Japanese are far ahead of the Chinese, but as to the notion of business and family independence, with the Chinese this is far more developed than with the Japanese. These two qualities may be set over against each other, the result being equality. Where the Chinese are inferior to the Japanese is in spirit, mental energy and enterprise. In the power of imitation the two nations are alike. The three qualities—spirit, enterprise, and power of imitation are second to none in importance in social development. The usual theory is that mental energy and enterprise are engendered by religion; and yet the Japanese are not religious. Comparing the Japanese with the English, the latter have a strong religious sense, have a great regard for truth for its own sake, and are extremely benevolent. In these qualities the Japanese are deficient, but they have the feeling of loyalty and filial piety very strongly developed. But what is remarkable is that without the three above-named qualities the Japanese have succeeded in adopting our civilisation. The idea of the equality of various classes and ranks of people is not developed in Japan.‡ Commenting on the above, the Shakai Zasshi says that there is nothing remarkably original about Dr. Paul's views, but that doubtless they represent the opinions of a certain section of foreigners.

† Mr. Leslie Stephen elaborates this argument in his lectures on "Social Rights and Duties."

The Yuitsu, the organ of the Jikkōkyō, or Practical Religion Shintoists, has in No. 48 an interesting article on the necessity of the sect's establishing a school of its own. The writer says that from very early times the sect founded by Kakugyō relied for its success on none of the forms, ceremonies, or appendages of other sects, but on the practical piety and force of character of its numerous adherents. From his 18th year, till he reached the extraordinary age of 108, did this leader of men devote himself unreservedly to good works and the teaching of religion thereby. Not a single line did he leave to be handed down to posterity. For four generations the sect possessed no sacred writings, but in the 5th generation a collection of 70 hymns on moral topics was published. But the principle of the sect, the non-reliance on sacred writings remained the same. In accordance with this principle, says the writer we are quoting, we have not thought it necessary to establish schools. But the Home Office has lately issued orders to the effect that each sect is to send in a full report of the schools under its care and that in the case of sects that have no schools they must explain by what methods their adherents are taught. At first I thought of explaining that we gloried in being different from other sects in having no schools, but on second thoughts, and guided by a number of considerations, I decided that we had better recognise the changed situation and so conform to the times as to found schools and take other steps to make our doctrines better known. The renown of our sect has already reached western lands, and not a few are the inquiries that I have received as to the written history of our career as a body. These queries are natural and should lead us to take some steps to make our teaching better known. The establishment of schools will be one step in this direction.

The Buddhists have recently been sustaining heavy losses by the burning of temples. Not long ago the chief temple of the Sōtō Sect was destroyed. This was followed on May 23rd by the total loss of the Dainembutsu-ji, the chief temple of the Yūzūnembutsu Sect. Out of 80 buildings connected with the temple no less than 67 were burnt, the total area covered by the fire being 2,400 tsubo. The chief temple was about 200 years old and it contained a number of valuable heirlooms. At the time of its erection the Yūzūnembutsu-shū was at the zenith of its fame, there being no less than 808 subordinate temples connected with the Dainembutsuji at that time. The fortunes of the sect have for a long time past steadily declined, and of late years the task of keeping the great central temple in repair has proved too much for the resources of its adherents. Hence it is not at all probable that any worthy successor to the old structure will be erected.

Another sacred building to be added to the doleful list is the Yenkyō-ji in Shoshazan, Harima; a very old and renowned edifice, containing numbers of valuable articles and relics which had taken 900 years to collect. It is not long ago that the Governor of Hyōgo visited this temple and expressed great astonishment at the rarity of the collection of heirlooms treasured therein and advised the priests to store these articles in some more secure place. They were all destroyed in the late fire. Well may the Bukkyō ask, "Does this wholesale destruction portend the steady downfall of the Buddhist faith?"

The Bukkyō reports that the Hongwanji purpose despatching four priests to America to labour among the Japanese residing there. The project has been talked about for some time, says the Bukkyō, but seems to have hung fire somewhat. That the maintenance of priests in foreign countries is a worthy way of spending money is not open to doubt, and if there is any body that can afford to launch out in this class of work it is the great Otani-ha. The sect has large sums of money at its disposal, says the Bukkyō. There is a surplus derived from various sources amounting to 552,557 yen. Then there is a capital of 1,444,493, the interest of which is available for various purposes.

The Bukkyō (No. 140) publishes the first of an important series of articles, entitled, "Two aspects of modern Buddhism and Future Propagandism," of which we give the gist below:—(1) Buddhism must assume a new attitude. Hitherto she has preached pessimism, and has separated herself from the world. Henceforth she must preach optimism, must enter into the spirit of the times, and occupy a position among the foremost ranks of mankind. Her future destiny will depend entirely on her ability to accomplish this task. (2) There is wide discrepancy between the language and the methods employed by priests as teachers of religion and those employed by them as scholars. Within the Buddhist pale as elsewhere the world of learning and the world of religion are very much at loggerheads. The youths who at school become acquainted with all the latest scientific theories and methods directly they become priests are called upon to follow the most antiquated methods and to preach doctrines that suited people in the middle ages but are out of date now. There is no attempt to harmonise faith and knowledge. Is it any wonder that the work of propagandism does not go on apace under these conditions? Can a religion be taught to any purpose without any attempt to adjust the teaching to the present state of knowledge? Briefly stated, the young Buddhist priests of the present day belong to one of four classes:—(1) They are of low birth and little intellect and know of no other way of getting a living. (2) Or they were forced into the priesthood by bigoted relations, and having been drilled in religious ways for years, have not the strength of character to throw up the profession against the wishes of their teachers and benefactors. (3) Or they are priests whose faith has been entirely shaken by modern influences and who are about to give up the priesthood and obtain a living in some other way. (4) Or, lastly, they are men who have determined to reconcile their faith and their knowledge, to revise their creed to the extent of finding a new basis for belief. Such priests are usually men of exceptional talent and strength of purpose, but we are obliged to confess that they are lamentally few in number. There are those who regard modern Buddhist education as an instrument of death to the creed. They say there is no surer way of extinguishing the last remaining embers of Buddhist fire than by teaching candidates for holy orders modern science. But we, says the Bukkyō, are not of this opinion. As nothing can stop the advance of knowledge, and as it is reasonable to expect that educated priests should be versed in this knowledge, the only course open is to adapt the old faith to the new knowledge. To confess that Buddhism has been superseded by the advance of learning, that the creed is out of date, and so on, is to underrate the capabilities and elasticity of the Buddhist faith. Let old beliefs be consigned to oblivion if they are out of joint with the spirit of the times. Let Buddhism no longer turn her back on the world and refuse to see any good in it. In increased optimism lies the secret of success.

Our readers will be interested in observing how similar in many respects are these remarks to those of Mr. Minami, one of the representatives of liberal Christianity, given in our last summary. The problem of all times and all countries, how to reconcile faith and knowledge, is engaging the attention of all deeply earnest minds in the Buddhist as well as in the Christian world.

GERMAN NEWS.

The Social Democrats succeeded in returning five out the six Berlin representatives in the last Diet, but could not carry more than three seats at the recent elections. The Berlin correspondent of The Times comments thus upon the fact:—

The results involve many consequences. In the first place, they inflict a serious blow on the prestige of the Social Democrats, who have lost their predominant position in the capital of the Empire. Nor can the Socialists maintain that their defeat is solely due to the combination of the divers opponents in support of the Radicals. For, as a matter of fact, their own poll on the second ballots is less by something like 3,620 votes as compared with 1893. I say roughly 3,620 vote, since corrected results, which do not appear to alter the material issue in any case, are coming in, as usual, while I write my despatch at 11 50 p.m. The Socialists are issuing statements to the effect that they have won the second division, but the official declaration of the poll gives it to the Radical by a majority of 15, as I have telegraphed.

The second consequence of the Berlin result is that the advantages of co-operation of the parties of civil order against the Socialists are triumphantly demonstrated. An example was set to the various supporters of the Government by Prince Hohenlohe himself, who to-day appeared at the polling-booth of his district to record his vote for the Radical. And if the parties of civil order can continue to combine against the party of revolution, not only will the latter yet suffer many a signal defeat, but, what is far more important, the whole tone of political life in Germany may undergo a change for the better. It may at last dawn upon the reactionaries that they are the worst foes of true Conservatism as well as of true progress, and that they cannot hope to baffle the party of pure negation save by encouraging a liberal and far-minded interpretation of the rights of the Crown and of the Executive. Above all, they may eventually—if this be not too much to hope—realize that the constant attempt to pass class legislation and to obstruct legislation which is intended to benefit the whole community is a fatal policy which can only lead to a Parliamentary impasse. The Radicals of Herr Richter's following may also in time learn that an inflexible doctrinaire attitude will deprive them of allies among moderate politicians, and that they must reckon with Germany as it is, with its foreign as well as its domestic problems.

The tone of the German press with reference to the Philippines shows more temper than judgment. A telegram published by the New York Post having stated that an agreement had been arrived at between the German Ambassador and the American Secretary of State with regard to the mission of Vice-Admiral von Diederichs to Manila, these journalistic comments were evoked:—

Admiral von Diederichs requires no instructions from Washington as to what he is to do or leave undone. So long as he does not interfere so as to promote the enterprises of the two belligerents, neither Admiral Dewey nor Secretary of State Sherman (sic) is competent to give him any directions whatever. In like manner the German Government will not concern itself with the measures which Spain or America may adopt for the maintenance of their interests in the Philippines. The phantoms of the American imagination are beginning to be positively ridiculous. We have not the slightest intention of exciting ourselves over the perfidious insinuations against Germany which the New York and Washington Press unfortunately adopt from London. We leave it to the course of events to make the Americans ashamed of themselves and to bring them to reason.—(Cologne Gazette.)

A German Admiral knows quite well in what fashion he has to maintain and protect the interests of his countrymen. He would most energetically repel any impertinent attempt to meddle in his affairs. This is the proper answer to the presumptuous Yankee Press.—(Berliner Lokalanzeiger.)

Referring to these perfervid paragraphs, it was noted in England that the Berlin Liberal organ had apparently forgotten one little fact, namely, that the "insinuations" about German designs on the Philippines were originally formulated by a German news agency and were welcomed and prominently published by the Cologne Gazette itself. Moreover, the Berlin correspondent of The Times, writing under date of July 1st, says:—"One has only to ask intelligent and independent advocates as well as opponents of German colonial expansion here in every class of the community, and the answer invariably is that it may be regarded as quite certain that Germany will do her best to obtain a footing on the islands."

The German Colonial Society at Danzig has adopted a proposal that "in all the German protectorates German residents should be allowed to perform their obligatory military service in the local forces of the colony, and that, in the interests of colonial prosperity, there should be certain modifications in the length of their term of service and in the nature of their military duties."

The Social Democrats in Germany claim to have polled 2,125,000 votes in the recent elections, against a total of 1,786,738 in 1893. But careful analysts point out that the figures, if taken alone, would be misleading in this case, since the Socialists adopted the tactics of setting up a candidate in each of the 397 constituencies without any regard to his chances of success.

The following letter appears in The Times on the subject of "British v. German Commercial Interests in the Philippines":—

Sir,—So much has been written lately as to the importance of the German commercial houses in the Philippine Islands, while nothing has appeared as to British interests, that I feel it my duty as a resident of about 20 years in those islands to bring the matter before the public. Your Madrid Correspondent, in his article of the 19th inst., mentions the number of German commercial houses in Manila as 150, and remarks that this astonishing piece of news comes from a German official source, and certainly the said official must have gone out into the by-ways and hedges to have found them. There is no doubt that of late years—since the tariff on imports has been so much increased—a number of small German importers have opened at Manila, and, not being too fastidious in their relations with Custom-house officials, only too ready to do themselves a good turn at the expense of the Government, have gained a considerable amount of the import business. These import houses—a tobacco factory or two, and a number of shopkeepers—about constitute German commercial interests in these islands. On the other hand, the export business, which is of considerably more importance than the import trade, is almost entirely in the hands of British houses, while the importation of petroleum, coal, sugar-cane crushing machinery, and the greater portion of Manchester goods is also in their hands. British capital built the one railway, and two out of three banks established in the islands are British, the remaining one being Spanish.

I may mention that for many years a good deal of dissatisfaction has been felt by the British residents in the Philippines at the apathy displayed by our Government as to their interests, culminating lately in the tardy despatch of a man-of-war on the outbreak of hostilities between the United States and Spain; while those of Germany were invariably shelped by their Government. The tendency to do a mere retail trade in many articles, the disinclination of the larger British houses to deal in goods of only small consumption, cheap Continental freights, and the dealings in the Custom house, already referred to, are some of the causes which have helped the growth of German houses; but to compare their interests in these islands to the British is quite out of the question.

I am, Sir, &c., VERDAD.

There appears to be no doubt that the Emperor of Germany intends to visit Turkey, Egypt, and Jerusalem. According to the present programme, his Majesty will arrive in Constantinople on October 17th; will remain there five days; will thence pass to Asia Minor, finally crossing to Egypt, where he will spend ten days and will go up the Nile as far as Assuan. November 15th is mentioned as the date of arrival in Cairo. It may well be imagined that this very exceptional trip excites a deal of surprise and conjecture. The Novosti thinks that his Majesty wishes to make himself acquainted with Asia Minor as a field for German emigration. It writes:—

German policy has done all it can of late years to direct emigration towards Asia Minor. This is an important matter for Europe, since it indicates an intention on the part of Germany to decide the Eastern question in accordance with her own interests. The German Emperor wishes, through the medium of the Roman Curia, to obtain a protectorate over the Turkish Catholics similar to that already acquired in China at the expense of France. A new epoch of the Eastern question is inaugurated with the Emperor's journey.

Whatever be the Emperor's real motive, it can not be denied that he is remarkably successful in keeping the eyes of Europe fixed on him. The Imperial theatre is equipped with an infinity of shifting scenes.

A British naval training squadron, consisting of the Raleigh, the Volage, the Champion, and the Cleopatra, is cruising in European waters. At Molde on July 14th, the Emperor of Germany invited some twenty officers of the Squadron to visit him on the Hohenzollern. "When the officers arrived on board, the Imperial yacht was decked with bunting, and the band played British national airs. The visitors and the members of the Imperial suite entered into very friendly conversation, and the Emperor presented the commander of the squadron with his portrait. The departure of the squadron was attended by great ceremony. The vessels, with the crews manning ship, circled in procession round the Hohenzollern. As the Raleigh, Volage, Champion and Cleopatra passed the Hohenzollern their crews gave three hearty cheers for the Emperor, to which the men of the Hohenzollern responded with three hurrahs for Queen Victoria, the band of the Imperial yacht playing 'God save the Queen.'"

As bearing on a subject which will soon be the burning question of the hour and is probably destined to prove a live shell in the Far-Eastern magazine, we quote the following from The Times' Berlin correspondence:—

Berlin, July 13.

The ultimate policy to be adopted by the United States in the settlement of the Philippine Islands—for that the Spanish flag must soon cease to wave over them is regarded here as certain—affords abundant material in the German Press for predictions as to their future. The difficulties arising out of the present state of things, of which it is asserted that the Americans hardly take sufficient account, may soon assume alarming proportions, such, indeed, as may finally necessitate the intervention of those Powers whose commercial interests in the islands are affected. The Kreuz Zeitung, in connexion with this subject, points out that the annexation of these islands by America is not yet a fait accompli, and that, if probable, it is by no means a necessary action. Their annexation would mark a new era in the policy of the United States necessitating, as any further aggrandisement of their colonial possessions must do, a complete change in their present military and naval system. "Already the first step in this direction has been taken by the annexation of the islands of Hawaii; America must now play her part in Asiatic affairs." The Monroe doctrine has fallen to the ground, and although the Philippines have not yet come into the possession of the United States, it is evident that a new policy—a policy of Imperialism—has begun and that the Stars and Stripes may very shortly wave over Manila.

The Post is somewhat more reserved in its utterances, being content with criticizing an article by Mr. John Foreman in the Contemporary Review. Aguinaldo, who is at the same time a good general and a skilful diplomatist, is considered unlikely to suffer any attempt by America to oust him from the position of military governor of the islands. Even if the islands are annexed, it may be a long time before the Americans will be able to restore order should the natives, headed by their able chief, refuse to acknowledge the United States Government as their own.

The German army is to have special telegraph battalions. Three is the number named. It has been found that the business of military telegraphy has now assumed dimensions which forbid its being entrusted to the engineer corps as a subordinate function.

Germany seems determined to go ahead at Kiaochou. It is stated on good authority, we read, that the German Government intends to construct a first-class harbour there, and that a town is planned with every modern improvement. The seat of the German administration is now at Tsin-tau, which is not considered suitable and would not be near the new harbour. Land is not to be finally allotted to private individuals until the plans for the proposed town are completed. Who is to build the town, however? Of that somewhat essential point we hear nothing.

If we, at this end of the world, were astounded at the utterly insignificant damage inflicted by the Spanish squadron on the American ships at Santiago, the surprise was not less signal in Europe. The National Zeitung gives interesting expression to German opinion in the subject:—

It was the first occasion since the transformation of wooden ships into iron ones in which it can in all fairness be said that the rival fleets of two hostile nations were engaged in deadly conflict. The war between Japan and China in 1894 was too unequal to admit of any logical deductions being drawn therefrom; but the battle off Santiago was a different thing. There the Spanish ships were—ships of the newest construction and fitted out with all the latest improvements—were face to face with American ships, and yet the entire Spanish fleet was destroyed, while, on the other hand, the American ships were apparently unscathed. How is this to be accounted for? There was no ramming as at Lissa, when Tegetthoff rammed the Italian Admiral's ship; there was no trace of any daring attempt by the Spaniards by sudden flank movements to outwit their adversaries; there was, apparently, but little attempt made on either side to circumvent the other; the heavy guns of the Spaniards were useless; a dogged determination on the part of the Spaniards to stick to their guns forms the dominating note of this naval battle. It is evident from this that the importance of "machinery" has now been fully demonstrated. The Spaniards were decimated by the superior quick-firing guns of the Americans; neither their guns nor their indomitable courage availed them anything. The critic then goes on to say that at Abukir in 1798 some of Nelson's ships were old and worn out and that his fleet was numerically inferior to that of the French; his genius, however, overcame all difficulties; the battle was won by the superior handling of his fleet. Then at Trafalgar the action of the Royal Sovereign in breaking through the united French and Spanish ships and only opening fire when alongside between the Fougaut and the Santa Anna is described as being impossible nowadays. The stories so frequent in the days of wooden ships of individual acts of heroism are now things of the past. Santiago has shown us that only machine guns and accurate shooting are of any account in modern naval warfare.

In conclusion, the writer is of opinion that all nations will at once set to work to increase their naval forces and that special attention will be devoted to the perfecting of machine guns, which constitute, he says, "the most important factor of modern warfare." He adds:—"Another irrefutable proof has been given to the world that a nation, however strong on land, if she be not provided with a powerful and adequate fleet, is ipso facto of no account as a Power in the future history of the world."

We should like to know exactly what the National Zeitung means by saying that the war between China and Japan was too unequal to allow of any logical deductions being drawn from it. The truth is that it was incomparably more equal than the struggle at Santiago. In the battle of the Yalu the superiority in armour and weight of armament was actually with the Chinese. The day was won by the operation of exactly the same factors that gave scathless victory to the Americans at Santiago—quick-firing guns well served. But what were the quick-firers of the Spaniards doing?

The very unfriendly feeling shown by the German Press towards the United States appears to have undergone a change. We have hitherto refrained from quoting the bitter and ungenerous language used by several of the leading German journals, and we are now glad to be able to take the following from The Times' correspondence:—

Berlin, July 10th.

In the temporary lull following on the fiercely contested battles round Santiago and the destruction of Admiral Cervera's fleet, German war criticism has assumed a more moderate character, though here and there certains organ cannot refrain from making the most of the "egregious blunders" of the American army, while at the same time ignoring, or feigning to ignore, the equally egregious blunders of the Spaniards. On the whole, however, and no doubt in great part owing to the recent speech of the American Ambassador to Berlin, Mr. White, at Leipzig on the 4th inst., the German Press has distinctly moderated the somewhat anti-American attitude it had adopted ever since the outbreak of hostilities. As I pointed out in my telegram of Friday morning, the prevailing feeling in Germany is that an army recruited on the spur of the moment from raw levies has not and never can have that indomitable esprit de corps peculiar to the great armies of Napoleon, and in more recent times to the armies of 1866 and of 1870-71, which alone constitutes the "quintessence" of a great army. This feeling, innate in the German mind, has, doubtless, accentuated, if not indirectly provoked, the invectives of the German Press which have gone forth against the "amateur handling of the American army by its wholly incompetent officers." Then again, the verbosity of the American Press, its acrimonious tone towards the Spaniards, its "untrustworthy" reports with regard to the war, which are described as being both mendacious and puerile, and finally, the alleged attacks of its organs upon Germany—all these things have contributed to the ungenerous tone adopted by the German Press towards America. Now that the "militia" of America has proved itself not only valiant, but capable of fighting and defeating the army of a nation upon which the sun once never set and whose soldiers knew no equals, the German Press will, no doubt, adopt a more becoming tone towards the Americans.

The Frankfurter Zeitung, alluding to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by America, considers that the importance of the act lies in the fact that it denotes the inauguration in America of a new policy; that it is an unmistakable sign that a policy of Imperialism has begun and that as such it marks a new era in the history of the United States. "The islands of Hawaii have not been annexed for the purpose of prosecuting the cultivation of sugar and of furthering commercial interests, but chiefly because, since they lie on the route traversed by ships going from Vancouver to Australia, from San Francisco to Hongkong, and from Panama to Japan, they will afford valuable coaling and naval stations for America."

The Social Democrats commanded the largest number of votes at the recent elections in Germany. The following approximate return is given, the figures in brackets being those for 1893:—

The total number of qualified electors in the Empire was 11,200,000 (10,630,000). There voted 7,600,000 (7,700,000), or about 67 (72·4) per cent. The votes cast for the leading parties were:—Social Democrats, 2 120,000 (1,786,000); Clericals, 1,333,000 (1,468,000); National Liberals, 1,160,000 (997,000); Conservatives, 900,000 (1,038,300); Radical Left, 500,000 (666,400); Free Conservatives, 220,000 (438,400); Anti-Semites, 310,000 (263 900); Moderate Radicals, 230,000 (258,500); Poles, 180,000 (229 500); South German Democrats, 120,000 (166,800).

FRENCH NEWS.

It is curious to note that French financiers are only now talking seriously of abolishing the taxes on windows and doors and introducing an income tax "based on external evidences of means." The repeal of the greatly detested window tax and the imposition of an income tax are measures now half a century old in England.

The formation of a colonial army is evidently becoming a very practical programme in France. But it is not quite easy to follow the reasoning of M. Brisson in proposing this reform. "The conquests of France," he said, "must not be a sterile glory. We must summon to this fresh domain the energies lying idle at home, and encourage that emigration of intelligence and capital which will permit the development of the, as yet, almost untouched resources with which our colonies abound." It would seem that, according to M. Brisson's view, the failure hitherto made by France to develop the material resources of her colonies has been due to the want of a colonial army.

The new French Ministry has given a kind of pledge in the Chamber to be more open with the country in matters relating to foreign affairs than the Méline Cabinet was when M. Hanotaux presided at the Foreign Office. Frenchmen used to complain that they had to seek information from British Blue Books.

The Brisson Ministry is supported in office by the Republicans—for the most part Radicals,—by the Socialists and by the Anti-Semites. Fifty-two socialists and thirty-one Anti-Semites voted with M. Brisson in the first parliamentary battle on June 30th.

The Paris correspondent of The Times gives the following account of the personnel of the Brisson Cabinet:—

M. Brisson	Premier and Minister of the Interior
M. Delcassé	Minister for Foreign Affairs
M. Peytral	Minister of Finance
M. Sarrien	Minister of Justice
M. Léon Bourgeois	Minister of Education and Public Worship
M. Cavaignac	Minister of War
M. Lockroy	Minister of Marine
M. Trouillot	Minister of the Colonies
M. Marnéjouls	Minister of Commerce
M. Viger	Minister of Agriculture
M. Tillaye	Minister of Public Works

The Premier, M. Brisson, the son of a barrister, was born at Bourges in 1835, joined the Paris Bar, became a Freemason, and contributed to Republican journals. In 1866 he was an unsuccessful candidate for one of the Paris divisions. On the fall of the Empire he was appointed a deputy mayor of Paris, but resigned on the refusal of the Provisional Government to create a municipal council. In February, 1871, he became one of the Paris Deputies and voted with the Extreme Left. In 1879 he was elected one of the Vice-Presidents of the Chamber, and in 1881 he succeeded Gambetta in the Presidency. That post then seemed a stepping stone to the Chief Magistracy, and on Gambetta's death M. Brisson had a good prospect of attaining that position. Grévy, however, intent on re election, adroitly forced him in 1885 into the Premiership, rightly judging that this was the way to "use up" eventual rivals. At the elections of 1885 the Reactionaries won a large number of seats. This was largely attributed to the apathy of the Minister of the Interior, M. Allain Targe, who had fancied that the time had come for Government non-intervention in elections. The Brisson Cabinet consequently met the new Chamber in a weakened condition, and, though it began the series of enactments against pretenders, it fell at the end of the year. From 1886 till his return to the Presidency of the Chamber in 1896 M. Brisson, as a private member, was a Radical spokesman and was chairman of the Panama Inquiry Committee. For a time he figured as a naval critic, though not generally credited with any personal knowledge of the subject. He also, as chairman of the Budget Committee, devised a scheme of taxing conventual institutions out of existence, for he has a horror of mortmain, but that scheme, though enacted, has not been rigorously enforced. As President of the Chamber he was seldom betrayed into partisanship or loss of temper.

M. Delcassé, who has unexpectedly taken charge of the Foreign Office, was born at Pamiers in 1852 and was a journalist until elected to the Chamber in 1889. In 1893 he became Under-Secretary for the Colonies, then a subdepartment of the Ministry of Marine. He pressed for the elevation of the colonies into a distinct department, and to show that he aimed at no personal aggrandizement pledged himself to resign his post on this being done. After five months' interval he became Colonial Minister in the Dupuy Cabinet of May, 1894. A zealous advocate of colonial expansion, he advocated the formation of chartered companies on the English model. M Delcassé was till recently classed as a Moderate, but in the last Chamber he began voting against the Méline Cabinet. Of the 11 Ministers he is certainly the one most competent for the Foreign Office.

M. Peytral, born at Marseilles in 1842, was a chemist, in that city and represented it in the Chamber from 1881 to 1894, when he entered the Senate. Under Secretary for Finance under Carnot in the Freycinet Cabinet of 1886, he became Minister of Finance in the Floquet Cabinet of 1888, when, reviving Gambetta's idea of 1880, he proposed an income-tax, but failed in carry it. He returned to office in 1894 in the Dupuy Cabinet.

M. Bourgeois, a native of Paris, and 47 years of age, read for the Bar, entered the Chamber in 1888, was Floquet's Under-Secretary of the Interior in the same year, and was Minister of Education in the Freycinet and Loubet Cabinets. In 1892 he became Minister of Justice in the Ribot Cabinet. In 1895, failing to form a mixed Cabinet, he constituted the first purely Radical Ministry, himself taking the portfolio of the Interior and later that of the Foreign Office. His quarrels with the Senate eventually compelled him to resign. He now returns to the Education Department, the work of which he carried out with credit.

M. Sarrien, who was born at Bourbon Lancy in 1840, is a barrister. He was Minister of Posts in the Brisson Cabinet, Minister of the Interior in the Freycinet Cabinet, Minister of Justice under M. Goblet, and again Minister of the Interior under M. Tirard.

M. Cavaignac, son of General Cavaignac, was born in 1853. He refused at a Paris college to receive a prize from the Prince Imperial. He became a civil engineer, entered the Chamber in 1882, was Under-Secretary for War in the Brisson Cabinet, Minister of Marine in 1892, and Minister of War in the Bourgeois Ministry. He is the author of a book on Prussian history. He owes his new post to the stand made by him against the Dreyfus revision.

M. Lockroy, born in 1840, was Renan's secretary in Syria, became a Paris journalist, married Victor Hugo's daughter-in-law, and has been a Deputy, first for Aix and then for Paris, since 1876. Minister of Commerce in 1885, of Education in 1888, and of Marine in 1895, he has been a strenuous advocate for a powerful navy, and is now bound to propose lavish naval expenditure.

M. Viger, a physician, born in 1843, was Minister of Agriculture in the Dupuy (Casimir-Perier) Cabinet, and again in the second Dupuy Cabinet.

Mr. Trouillot, who, to the general surprise, has become Colonial Minister, is a barrister. He was born in the Jura in 1851, entered the Chamber in 1889, and first became prominent a fortnight ago in the discussion which led to the crisis.

M. Marnéjouls, a barrister, born in Aveyron in 1847, entered the Chamber in 1889 and has interested himself in labour questions. Multitudes of Frenchmen, however, will now hear his name for the first time. So also with M. Tillaye, a Caen barrister, who was elected a Senator in 1896.

The Méline Ministry had the longest tenure of office of any Cabinet under the Third Republic, namely, 26 months.

With regard to the alleged confession of Dreyfus, M. Dupuy affirms that immediately after the ceremony of Dreyfus' degradation, Captain Lebrun-Renault reported the confession to his superior officers who made a note of it, and that in October or November, 1897, Captain Lebrun-Renault, at the request of General Billot, made a written attestation of the confession.

THE SURRENDER OF MANILA.

An official telegram received in Tokyo from Hongkong, under date of August 16th, gives fuller particulars of the fall of Manila than were contained in our own correspondent's telegram. It runs:—On the 13th inst. the Americans attacked Manila both by land and sea, the battle lasting for about two hours. The Spanish were unable to repulse the attack, and the city was occupied by the Americans. The Governor-General of the Philippines arrived at Hongkong yesterday by the German man-of-war, Kaiserin Augusta.

Governor-General Augustin left Manila before the last engagement, having been superseded.

MR. DETRING AND CHINA'S MINES.

Mr. Detring has arrived here, writes the Peking correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News, and placed before the Tsung-li Yamên an application for a concession to work coal mines within a certain specified area, on the same basis as the Kaiping colliery, in the province of Chihli. It is said, and I have every reason to believe it to be true, that he is acting in the interests of a German syndicate, who have offered to lend a sum equivalent to about £250,000 sterling. The general impression seems to be that the request will be granted, in which case it will somewhat interfere with the prospects of the Peking Syndicate in Shasi, as the latter province cannot hope to compete with mines with coal equal in quality and so much nearer the seaboard.

LIFE IN EAST LONDON.

Mr. Percy Alden, who is at present travelling for his health in this country, is the Warden of Mansfield House, one of the University Settlements of London. The University, or Social, Settlement is of comparatively recent origin, but already there are in London alone over a dozen, while the United States boasts of 50 or 60, formed during the past 8 years. The Settlements both in England, and America are beginning to play a very large part in the religious, social, and educational life of the working classes. In some cases, as e.g. at Toynbee Hall in Whitechapel, and Hale House in Chicago, there is no definite religious teaching, but the contention is, first, that the conditions are unfavourable, and, second, that there is such a thing as religious work apart from religious teaching. Mansfield House, which has from 8 to 12 men in residence from the universities of England, claims that it touches in its operations all the many-sided life of the people. Nothing is called common or unclean. Whether it be the formation of a workinginen's club, the instruction given in class or lecture, or free legal and medical advice—all are regarded as being of importance. The contention, in fact, of the leaders of this Settlement is, that all work done in the religious spirit is religious work. Mr. Alden, who started the work, has been living in East London over 7 years, during which time he has been aided by a band of young men who not only had ideals but knew how to realize them in actual practice. The great German poet has said, "it is ever true that he who does nothing for others, does nothing for himself." The effort put forth has been the effort of self-realization in the lives of other men, and in this spirit all such work will succeed. That it has succeeded in this case is evidenced by the fact that over 2,000 men belong to its various societies, whose branches ramify over the whole area of Canning Town. The district is a labouring and artizan district in the extreme East. Ironworkers, gasworkers, dockers, stevedores, and factory hands all jostle one another for a living. The population is increasing with the utmost rapidity, something like 10,000 people a year being added to the already large number. It must of course be remembered that Canning Town is only a very small portion of East London, which contains 1¼ millions of people, but new districts are springing up everywhere and the final outcome of this mushroom growth it is almost impossible to foretell.

Apart from its religious and educational work, Mansfield House claims pre-eminence in two things. 1. Civic and municipal work—that is to say the work of local administration. 2. Influence on the labour movement. It is impossible to do more than mention the former point, but there can be no doubt that a great deal of the success of the Settlement is due to its persistent attempt to educate the "civic conscience." The House has asserted itself for some years past as the exponent of what Prof. Bryce has called "pure politics," and Mr. Alden on the Town Council of West Ham, of which he is at the present time Deputy Mayor, has been able with the assistance of his colleagues to obtain public baths, free libraries, recreation grounds and parks, picture exhibitions, better sanitation and higher wages for the council's employées.

In the same way upon the School Board, which regulates the educational work of the district, Newland, Reason and now Crichton, the present sub-warden, have been attempting to provide "a ladder of learning," up which even the child of a casual docker may climb to the University.

In addition to a large workingmen club, with 500 members, and a lad's club with 300 members, both of which clubs have their separate and private premises, the Settlement possesses a Lodging House with 130 beds. This house provides accommodation for the very poorest, the charge being 8 cents a night. The place is almost always full and is regarded as the best and cleanest lodging-house in East London. It is greatly used by sailors, many of whom regard it as their home.

One other interesting institution is that of the Poor Man's Friend and Lawyer—a society which gives free legal advice to any workingman. In this way over 3 000 clients are aided every year, and a link of friendship and brotherhood is established between the men who have had many opportunities in life and the East Ender who has had very few.

As to religious work, it is sufficient to say that the meetings are held in the largest Hall in the district, which seats 1,200 people, and that frequently at its two meetings on the Sunday no vacant seat can be found. The workingmen are beginning to show that they understand the meaning of Christianity by the way in which they help one another in all difficult and troublous times, and by the new spirit which is growing up in the Trades Union. Many people would look upon this as a sign for evil rather than for good, but Christianity must be regarded "not as a thing of the stars but a thing of the streets," and believing this, Mansfield House uniformly assists every just and righteous effort which workingmen are making for the amelioration of their social conditions.

JAPANESE FACTS AND COMMENTS.

The Tokyo Shimbun alludes to a scheme for the formation of a political party devoted to the abolition of the Constitution. Immediately before the dissolution of the previous Cabinet, steps were taken, our contemporary alleges, by a section of the clan statesmen to organise a clique with a view to bringing about the partial suspension of the Constitution. The movement proved ineffectual. Now, strange to say, the question is again upon the tapis, and advocates of the movement are reported to have determined upon "raising their banner" openly in a few days. The new coterie consists of Marquis Yamagata, Count Inouye, Baron Sonoda, and several distinguished personages, Mr. Furuzawa Shigeru being enlisted as chief councillor. Secret meetings have been frequently held at the residence of the last mentioned politician, and a manifesto of considerable length is said to have been drafted. It will contain a statement that constitutional government has, in all respects, been a complete failure everywhere except in England, where alone it is a brilliant success owing, probably, to the peculiar political training of her people. All other countries have failed to reap any benefit, and all are disgusted with their constitutions. Experience attests the truth of this statement in regard to the Japanese constitution, which has been in operation for the past few years, and which, instead of securing benefits for the nation, has instead created innumerable abuses. The constitution for these reasons should speedily be rescinded. It is said that this manifesto will shortly be published and distributed to the public.

We (Japan Mail) do not hesitate to pronounce this statement, if not totally untrue, certainly a great exaggeration. Baron Sonoda, Chief of the Metropolitan Police under the Ito Cabinet, may entertain the views attributed to him by the Tokyo Shimbun. We can not say anything definite about him. But to pretend that Marquis Yamagata and Count Inouye advocate the abolition, or even the suspension, of the Constitution is quite absurd. No one acquainted with these statesmen can believe anything of the kind for a moment.

On the evening of the 9th instant, Mr. Matsuda, Minister of Finance, received the Kokumin's representative at his official residence, and gave forth the following views on the financial situation:—The proposed increase of the land tax is not at all feasible; the deficiency in the revenue can be supplied without recourse to such a measure. The imposition of a tax on sugar can be undertaken without the consent of the treaty powers, and special trade taxes can also be imposed upon dealers in this commodity. As indirect taxes are preferable to direct taxes, steps will be taken to fix imposts upon articles which constitute the luxuries of the rich. As for the saké tax, the question is to what extent the impost can be further raised, remains still unsettled, but considering the waste that accompanies the use of saké at public and private entertainments, it follows that an increased tax will meet with little objection from consumers. The abolition of export duties is absolutely necessary. The purchase by the Government of public bonds has continued up to the present time in accordance with the programme formulated by the preceeding Cabinet. But nothing really beneficial can be expected from the experiment. The step had to be undertaken to relieve the industrial community by restoring funds which had been squeezed from it by the Government at the time of the war. As for the introduction of foreign capital, no temporising schemes can ever prove successful. A path must be opened for the mutual utilization of both domestic and foreign funds, and the latter ought to be directly introduced so as to supply the deficiency in capital now so very apparent in Japan. The question of the State ownership of railways deserves strong condemnation. The Government should allow foreigners the privilege of acquiring shares in railways and public companies generally. No justification exists for withholding these rights from aliens—unless the old joi spirit still overshadows the Government and the people. The fear that foreigners will buy up the whole of the railways of Japan is very childish. To my way of thinking, the opposite will prove the case. Foreigners seeing the illiberality of the Government's ways of dealing with them will abstain from investing money in the country, and the nation will have only itself to blame. I would also concede the right of working mines, under their own supervision, to aliens, for nothing is more absurd than the idea that the domestic enterprises of Japan should be developed exclusively by Japanese, and by Japanese funds. The opening up of the rich mining districts of China in the near future will attract foreign capital to that country in increasing quantities, and one day Japan, unless she changes her policy, will wake up and find she has let her chance of obtaining foreign capital slip by without prospect of recovery. Now is the time for Japan to come boldly forward to invite the co operation of foreign capitalists. Unfortunately the action of the last Government in selling War Bonds abroad has prevented the nation from obtaining money from foreign markets at less than 4 per cent. This will be the price it will have to pay as soon as the Indemnity is exhausted and Japan has to go abroad for money. And it might have been so different.

Vernacular papers are busily engaged in critising the proposed scheme for increasing the saké tax. Some interesting articles on the subject have been reproduced in our columns from time to time. The Osaka Asahi again takes up the parable, alleging that the rates of increase now under contemplation are of three different grades, namely, 10, 12, and 15 yen per koku. The following comparative table shows the gross revenue from the saké tax during the past five years:—

Year.	Revenue. Yen.	Increase. Yen.
1894	16,637,435	824,548
1895	16 130,253	507,182
1896	17,747,028	1,616 775
1897	18,407,867	660 839

Thus, compared with the revenue in 1897, the figures for 1898 show an increase of only 11,415 yen, though the impost was raised from 4 to 7 yen that year. Supposing the average brewing to amount to 4 million koku annually, an increase to 10 yen per koku in the tax would secure a revenue of 12 million yen, whereas 20 million could be realized by raising the rate to 12 yen, and 32 millions by fixing it at 15. The authorities appear to anticipate an increase of a million koku in the brew after the brewing for domestic consumption has been prohibited. This anticipation, is too vague however. Nevertheless, Count Okuma seems to place great hopes on the saké tax and is reported by the Osaka Asahi to have declared that the new impost must be made to defray the expenditures on the Army and Navy. The Treasury estimates that the revenue to be derived from the saké tax in the next fiscal year should not fall short of 50 million yen. But how is the saké tax to be increased next year? A suggestion was put forward as to the advisability of altering the present fiscal year, hitherto reckoned from April 1st to March 31st. This is now to be changed to a period running from December 1st to November 30th.

The Shogyo is surprised at the Korean Government's adopting gold monometallism. The coinage system of Korea, our contemporary remarks, has not yet emerged from the rudimentary stages, and it is very doubtful whether gold monometallism can ever be enforced in a country that is without the necessary reserves of gold. The attempt must surely end in failure. Korea, being still unable to undertake the coinage of silver, is not in a position to adopt the gold standard. Her currency consists entirely of silver yen and Japanese notes; her customs duties on imports from this country are collected in Japanese paper money, and imports from China and other countries of the Orient are taxed in silver corresponding in value to Japanese convertible notes. In short, Japanese currency virtually constitutes the media of exchange in the whole of the little empire. The adoption of a gold standard under these circumstances is simply farcical.

The discourtesy of government railway officials toward foreign and Japanese passengers has passed into a proverb, remarks the Tokyo Asahi. In view of this fact the Superintendent of the Railway Construction Bureau recently issued the following note to various stations on the Government lines:—Despite instructions, frequently issued, in regard to the treatment of railway passengers, it is to be regretted that the authorities still fail to satisfy public criticism, the feelings of passengers in most cases being seldom considered by railway servants. This condition of affairs tends to impair the general credit of the Government railways. Persons employed at railway stations should always be careful in their language as well as in their deportment towards passengers; and should also endeavour to give all necessary information to travellers, old and young, women, as well as men, when it is sought by those apparently not accustomed to railway matters; and in cases where accommodation is found to be insufficient on account of pressure of passengers, or suspension of trains, the cause should be explained with urbanity and courtesy. Overseers are required, simultaneously with the enforcement of these instructions, to report when subordinates are known to have acted contrary to their directions.

On the afternoon of the 9th instant, the Naniwa Spinning Company held an extraordinary meeting at the Osaka Chamber of Commerce, with regard to the decision previously arrived at, that the company's affairs be wound up. Over forty shareholders were in attendance, the rest being represented by proxies. The question of dissolution was unanimously determined upon, and the agents of the Sumitomo and Yasuda Banks and four others were nominated as appraisers under the direction of Mr Tanaka, who is to act as chairman. The properties of the Company, including the buildings, plant, cotton, and yarns, are valued at 720,000 yen, out of which loans of all descriptions to the amount of 530,000 yen have to be met, leaving a balance of 190,000 yen. The company suspended work on the 1st instant, having dismissed its operatives, with the exception of 300, who are still employed. It is said that the buildings, which originally cost the Company 300,000 yen, have depreciated in value very much and are not now worth more than 125,000 yen.

The Jiji's correspondent makes the following remarks upon the Japan Railway Company:—Not infrequently has the Company been accused of having made an unnecessary expansion of its business, and the reduction in the rates of dividend was ascribed to the steady decline of its transactions. But the accusers appear to have failed to verify their charges by arithmetic. According to the statements made by the principal officials of the Company, the gross capital at the end of the 1st half of the 26th year of Meiji amounted to 19 199,000 yen, the total train mileage run during that period being 1,056,000 miles, realizing 1.26 yen per mile. In the corresponding period of the 31st year the figures are represented to have reached 41,469,940 yen and 2,610 000 miles, the average receipts being 1 33 yen per mile, while the increase, in capital was 116 per cent and in mileage 124 per cent. The Iwaki line is in process of construction, and a portion of the working capital employed on it is as yet unproductive. The two lines—Tsushima and Iwaki—cover a distance of over 200 miles, and had not the work on them been undertaken by the Japan Railway Company, it might have been entered on by another company. The recent appreciation of Iwaki coal and the steady growth of the fisheries along the railways fully attest the ultimate value of the undertakings. In the 1st half of the 26th year of Meiji, the Company owned 591 miles of railway, securing 2,209 yen per mile. The mileage increased in the 31st year to 811, the traffic receipts then being 4 299 yen per mile. As to the question of staff, it may be noted that whereas the aggregate number of employes in the 26 h year was only 4,277, it had risen in the 31st year to 10,895. From what has been said, it may be inferred that the expansion of the general programme of the Company was undertaken, not with speculative motives, but in face of absolute necessity. The reduction in the rates of dividends was simply attributable to the increase of expenditures caused by extraordinary changes in the financial market. If the Company is to be blamed for the timely extension of its undertaking, no enterprising corporation, the writer adds, can escape similar censure.

Two schemes for the introduction of foreign capital are about to be inaugurated, says the Yorozu. The one involves an amount of 10 million yen, to be borrowed by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. According to the Company's calculations, the rate of its own dividend is to be fixed at 8 per cent., and the interest on the foreign capital at 2 or 3 per cent. Negotiations have already been opened between the President and a certain foreign capitalist. The other scheme aims at securing 100 millions from Germany through the 100th National Bank, with the idea of distributing it as loans to various railway and commercial and industrial companies. Mr. Ikeda Kenzo is said to be the prime mover in this project, which is considered not to have so good a prospect of success as the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's scheme.

The weekly return of the Bank of Japan, published in the Tokyo Asahi, shows an unabated tendency to reduce the issue of loans and discounted bills. The total reduction in these two items during last week is reported to have reached two million yen, and it was attended with a corresponding decrease in the ordinary convertible notes, as well as those above the legal limit, to the amount of 171,792,732 yen and 12,614,627 yen respectively. The specie reserves against these notes totalled 76,161,994 yen. The amount of loans and discounted bills issued at the Head Office up to the 13th instant was 17 258,048 and 13,430,331 yen respectively making a total of 30 688,579 yen. These figures, together with the amounts reported from Osaka and other branches and agencies, indicate an aggregate total of something less than 60 millions. Repayments are still continuously flowing in.

Taking as its text social changes in the empire during the past few years, the Mainichi says the era of commonalty has just come in, and clan Government has been superseded by a democratic form of administration. Questions of no ordinary character will surely present themselves in the near future, one of the most important being the problem of pauperism. Japan has been so far indifferent to the question of pauperism, apparently for two reasons, first the distinction between poor and rich was not so great as in other countries; secondly, the people were engrossed in the task of destroying the aristocracy which lorded it over them. Now, however, pauperism is a problem which is forcing itself on their attention. The miserable condition into which the poor have fallen is astonishing. In Tokyo the streets of Shinami in Shiba, Choja machi in Shitaya, and Samegashi in Yotsuya are notorious as slums where hunger and vice reign supreme. The inhabitants of these streets are mostly beggars, or outcasts who have been convicted of theft or armed robbery. Even a great many of the honest poor are fast sinking into this wretched condition in consequence of their inability to pay the local and national taxes, and the resulting seizure and sale of their property. It is said that people in this melancholy situation number millions. As for defaulters in connection with the House Tax, the average number is reported to exceed 32,000 annually. Supposing each of them to have a family of five, the aggregate total of paupers will be no less than 1,600,000. It is curious to observe that the amount of taxes on account of which these people are subjected to legal procedure scarcely exceeds an average of 20 sen per head. Yet, falling once into the clutches of law, they are deprived of a house to live in, food to eat, and are eventually compelled to wander through the streets begging. On the other hand, luxury has greatly increased, among the rich and the middle classes. Indeed, social inequality has almost reached its climax. Unless attention is paid to it there will be some day a desperate struggle between the wealthy and the sans culottes.

The Kokumin gives the following bird's eye view of the political situation:—The Liberals and Progressists, who together compose the Constitutional Party, were while they figured as distinct parties, numerically represented in the Diet by 98 and 91 respectively. The result of the recent election shows the number of Progressists to have increased to 103, while that of the Liberals has fallen to 96—a complete victory on the part of the Progressists. It is said that the total strength of the Progressists, when combined with other politicians in sympathy with them, will be 110, against a possible 100 Liberals and their adherents. The whole Constitutional Party numbers at present 229 members, as against 71 of other minor parties, whose sympathy the Progressists and Liberals alike endeavour to secure. The alliance of the Satsuma clique, consisting of 12 members supported more or less loosely by eight others, is a particular object of desire. It may be noted that the Progressists have secured the whole of the Northeast, including Toyama, Niigata, Fukushima, Akita, Aomori, and Iwate, together with Ibaraki and Tokyo in Kwanto, whence their ascendency extends to Tokaido as far as Shizuoka and Mie. In Shikoku the two prefectures, Tokushima and Kagawa, constitute their most important posts; in Chugoku their sway extends over Okayama, and in Kiushiu over Oita and Saga. Classified according to territorial divisions or provinces, the figures for the Progressist members stand thus:—In Tohoku (Yechigo and Ou), 29; in Kwanto (including Shinshiu), 24; in Tokaido (including Shiga and Gifu), 15; Hokuroku (Fukui, Ishikawa, and Toyama), 6; Kinki (Kinai and Wakayama), 10; Shikoku, 6; Chugoku, 4; Kiushiu, 7. The Liberals have their headquarters in Kwanto and Kwansai, and their sphere of influence sweeps Chiba, Saitama, Kanagawa, Nagano, Yamanashi, Aichi, Gifu, Fukui, Ishikawa, Kochi and Yehime, Hiogo, Wakayama, Tottori, Shimane Fukuoka and Nagasaki. Classified according to divisions they show the following result:—In Kwanto, 19; Tokoku, 1; Tokaido, 14; Hokuroku, 8; Kinki, 12; Shikoku, 11; Chugoku, 10; Kiushiu, 11. As for the National Unionists the figures are:—7 from Yamaguchi, 6 Kumamoto, 9 Kiushiu, 8 Chugoku, 2

Tokaido, and 1 Kinki. The Independents are —2 from Kwanto, 1 Tohoku, 3 Tokaido, 10 Kinki, 2 Shikoku, 3 each Chugoku and Kiushiu.

The latest investigations, according to the Nippon, show the number of banking institutions in Osaka to have reached 91 in all. Of these 6 are chartered as National Banks, 58 are carried on under the system of joint stock companies, 14 take the form of joint capital corporations, 1 that of private partnership, and 12 those of individual private banks. Corporations which have a paid-up capital of over 500,000 yen, do not exceed 14 in number, the aggregate total of their capital being stated at 23,798,000 yen, of which 15,259,942 yen only is paid up. Besides the corporations above mentioned, 90 branches exist. Thus the machinery of banking business is almost in a state of perfection, but at the same time a true banker is not be found in Osaka. Any extraordinary changes in the economic market will frighten the Osaka bankers to such an extent that they find no alternative but to appeal to the Bank of Japan or government officials for aid. The bounty once secured, they devote but little attention to discharging their legitimate functions as bankers, but are frequently induced to undertake speculative enterprises. Even big banks well known to the public on account of the large amount of their capital canhardly escape the imputation of having undertaken donbtful speculations The Nippon Chiuritsu Ginko's recent speculative purchase of land in Formosa may be cited as an instance in proof of the above assertion, and the Osaka banks' indifference to the Municipal Harbour bonds offered for sale last year may be taken as another.

That the machinery of communications is hampered by innumerable defects has been recognised alike by Government and people It is, says the Jiji, of paramount importance that funds sufficient for efficiency should be provided and stricter control over the officials be instituted. To attain this end the accounts of the Communications Department should be kept on an independent footing, and not included in the general budget. Separate funds should be set apart for the improvement and development of enterprises undertaken by the Department. The latest investigations show the net profit of the postal services to be no less than 1,530,000 yen, and the telegraphs and telephones are reported to have secured 800,000 yen, and the railways 3,980 000 yen, making a total of nearly 6,300,000 yen. Yet with these great profits the authorities have failed to do anything palpable in the way of reform, inasmuch as the profits of the department are transferred to the general account. So long as this mode of dealing with the accounts is suffered to remain in operation, we can not look forward to the needed reforms with any degree of certainty.

ANOHER N.Y.K. STEAMER ASHORE.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha seems to be very unfortunate lately in regard to its coasting vessels. News of the third case of stranding within a few weeks comes to us by telegram this morning. The Mikawa Maru, a steamer of 2,000 tons, from Yokohama for western ports, went on a rock at 3 p.m. on the 17th instant off Asaumihara-mura, Iyo Prefecture. A hole nine feet long was torn in her starboard side, and another five feet long on the port side, the damage in both cases being amidships. Efforts were at once made to remove her cargo, a great deal of which has been transferred to the Toto Maru for transportation to Nagasaki. Hopes are entertained that the Mikawa, which was under the command of Captain Kitano, will be eventually got off. Extensive salvage plant has been already brought to the scene of the disaster, and Superintendent Captain Ewata has been despatched to supervise the operations.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GOVERNMENT'S FEELINGS TOWARDS FOREIGNERS.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—Referring to the Leader in your to-day's issue as to the attitude of the Government towards Foreigners, may I suggest that they could give a practical proof of their favourable attitude to us, by allowing Foreigners to compete with their own nationality in the matter of Government Tenders. These are amply safeguarded by bargain money and as a matter of fact some of them are taken by Foreigners through Japanese agents, but no Foreigners are allowed to take contracts direct. This adds to the cost of nearly everything the Government buys, either by a commission to a Japanese agent, or more generally by keeping the Government business in the hands of a few Contractors, who have made enormous profits on the business by the absence of competition.

Yours faithfully,

A BRITISH SUBJECT.

Yokohama, 12th August, 1898.

PIOUS IMPIETY.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—I do not know what explanation, if any, the editor of the Tokyo magazine called The Shepherd's Voice has ever made with regard to the name he applies to it; but, in the absence of any other explanation, the fact that it distinctly claims to be a Christian publication almost forces one to think that by "The Shepherd," is meant that One who, when He was on earth, spoke of Himself as "the good shepherd."—(John x., 11.)

As one of many of your readers who regret to see dishonour done (even though unintentionally) to the name of Christ, I ask leave to speak, through your columns, a word to those who are responsible for this very serious mistake.

The editor of The Shepherd's Voice would not be likely to dispute, I am glad to believe, the fact that the honour and reverence due to Almighty God are due also to Jesus Christ.—(John v., 23)

In view of this fact, does it not seem monstrous to give to any magazine, no matter how well conducted it may be, such a name as the one here in question? There may have been, there very likely was, some sort of pious intention in selecting this title; but I daresay that to most people, unbelievers as well as believers, it seems to show either a strange presumptiousness or a degree of callousness hardly less strange.

Again: This magazine seems to be for the most part polemic. Now, the Lord Jesus, in His manifold characters as prophet, priest, king, Son of Man, Son of God, etc., spoke as was fitting in each case. When He cleansed the Temple, or when He rebuked and denounced Parisees and hypocrites, was it as the Shepherd that He spoke? The voice of the Good Shepherd is known and loved by each and every member of His redeemed flock—(John x.4,5,27) and it is uttered to and for His own sheep. It does not seem to expect recognition by others than the sheep.—(John x., 25.)

The advertised tables of contents must be supposed to give a fair idea, even though an incomplete one, of what the magazine itself is. This being so, would it not be well if these tables were to give clearer indications than they do, of principles and motives and methods that are different from those of worldly partisans, as they must be if they are really those of Christ?

For Christians to oppose sectarianism and worldliness is well, no doubt,—(1., Cor., i, 10; Rom., xii, 2); but genuine opposition to these things will of course show its genuineness by itself avoiding the errors which it condemns. Such genuine opposition is not possible to unconverted men (Gal, v, 20, with Rom. viii. 7,8, and 1 Cor., ii, 14), nor is it possible to Christian men except in so far as they "walk in the Spirit" (Gal, v, 16 & 25). For the flesh in all of us is both worldly and partisan (1 Cor., iii. 3) though it may be religious too. Man is a religious animal.

Even though the editor of the The Shepherd's Voice may never before this have thought of the possibility of any one's supposing that by "The Shepherd" he might mean the Lord Jesus, may we not hope that he will now seriously consider the question of finding some other name for his magazine? A name less open than this to the charge of impiety would perhaps be more respected even by unbelievers; and certainly it would be less painful to not a few of the editor's fellow-Christians.

Thanking you for inserting this, and enclosing my card,

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, ELTEKON.

EDUCATING JAPANESE CHRISTIANS ABROAD.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—On reading your foot-note to 's last letter, I understood thereby that with his communication and that of another signed E. Snodgrass, the subject under discussion was to be considered as closed. But as you have admitted a letter signed "Kunwa" upon a slightly different phase of the same subject, you will perhaps allow me space for these final words of reply to all three correspondents, after which I willingly resign further discussion to abler pens than mine. Referring to 's letters, I may remind him that whatever may have been my previously formed opinions on the attitude of missionaries towards the Japanese, I did not commence this correspondence by advancing my individual views on the question, but took for my text the words of a Japanese, to whose opinions you must have attached some weight, or you would not have translated them from the vernacular religious press; and it was only because the Japanese writer's words, from which I made ample quotations, agreed so completely, not only with my own views, but with those of deeply thinking people who have studied the missionary question not only in Japan, but also in India and China, that I thought them worthy of bringing under special notice, I would therefore suggest to  that it is on the Japanese writer he should expend his evident animus—a display of which he makes in anything but a Christian spirit, ill calculated to increase the respect of out-siders for men of his profession—for, as I before remarked, surely the Japanese know their own wants and feelings on religious as well as secular subjects, better than foreigners can possibly hope to do.

E. Snodgrass proposes an amendment to my suggestion that, so far from "wishing to constitute myself a final tribunal" (as unjustly and erroneously attributed to me by ) I am ready to abide by the verdict of a consensus of public opinion outside of missionaries—his amendment being that, an assembly of educated listeners being called, one or two should speak for "Christianity" and the same number for "Infidelity." I would remind him that something of this kind was done not very long ago—in Tokyo, if I'm not mistaken—with the result of leaving the question exactly where it was before, as is always the case in such discussions.

Also, that the question between us is not one of "Christianity" versus "Infidelity," but simply, so far as my judgment goes, of the advisability or otherwise of insisting on presenting "Supernatural Christianity" to a people like the Japanese, who show no disinclination to adopt all that is good and practical in Christianity if only are eliminated therefrom certain doctrines of belief which they, in common with the greatest thinkers of the age, are agreed in considering non-essential to the progress of humanity at the present day. For why should they be compelled to accept certain dogmas which have been rejected by the highest intellects of England, France, and Germany?

The term "Christianity" is a wide and comprehensive one, and I should much like to know whether the statement quoted by  (from hearsay only) of a Governor of a certain province in Japan, that "Japan at the present needed Christianity more than anything else" was meant by him to refer (if he did use the words) to Christianity as presented to his nationals by the American missionaries, or to the advanced movements that always follow in its wake, as the higher education and superior social position of woman, the abolition of concubinage, the attempt at suppression of prostitution, etc., etc.,—all of which are movements for the good of the human race generally, as can be seen by any one of ordinary intelligence, whether he be heathen or Christian. E. Snodgrass asks, "who would have opened Churches to save the Japanese people from their sins, who would have established industrial schools for orphans, asylums for the poor, hospitals for the sick and diseased, published tracts against intemperance, narcotics, prostitution, etc, etc., if the missionaries had not done so? I answer—all this and more, would the Japanese people have done in their own good time, as soon as they saw it was for the good of their nation.

These things and many more, came only comparatively recently, within the memory of some of our elders yet living, to countries that had been professing Christianity for centuries! For instance, what was the condition of English prisons until John Howard and Elizabeth Fry exposed their horrors? And yet we are now crying out against the present state of prisons in Japan! What was the state of the Yorkshire schools in which were put away helpless orphaned or illegitimate children, before Charles Dickens wrote his "Nicholas Nickleby"? The history of all reforms is—first the reformer arises and exposes the abuse—then the reformation spreads and flourishes with a nation's growth, and nothing is gained by premature forcing, any more than in pursuing the same course with a hot-house plant.

I never heard that the foreign missionaries had aught to do in establishing the Red Cross Society throughout the length and breadth of Japan—an institution which may be pronounced almost perfect in its operations—as evidenced during the China-Japan war, in its impartial devotion to the sick and wounded of the enemy, as well as to its own countrymen. I fail to see whether that Society could have acted more nobly and devotedly had all its members been Christians, which most assuredly they were not!

In reply to "Kanwa's" request that "Impartial Observer" should favour him, "not only with many enlightened opinions, but with facts, figures, and items of actual experience" regarding Japanese Christians studying abroad, I respectfully refer him to  for information on those points, as it was he, and not I, who asserted that he had found Japanese students studying Christian theology in most of the colleges in the United States! I, as well as "Kanwa" would be glad to know from  whether these Japanese students were studying at their own expense, or whether they had been placed there at the expense of Mission Boards, for that is the real question at issue, not whether or no Japanese young men are studying theology in America, but whether they are are so placed by Mission funds?

For my part, I only made the suggestion that such a course of action on the part of Mission Boards would not only be of immense advantage to the Japanese, whose spiritual welfare they profess to have so much more at heart than that of the benighted ones in their own land, but would certainly do away with the cumbrous machinery at present needed to keep up foreign missions in Japan, where, after the preliminaries of salaries for the workers are adjusted—shipping companies have to be requested to abate a third of the regular passenger tariff to transport the missionaries to Japan, where thousands of dollars must be expended in building houses for them.—where additional money grants to their incomes are made for every new child born into a missionary family—where grants for travelling expenses must be forthcoming—where arrangements must be made for providing a year's holiday for every five year's work on not less than half-pay, it is understood—with doubtless many other monetary arrangements of which outsiders are never made cognisant, all of which outlay of mission funds could be avoided by the simple expedient of bringing Mahomet to the mountain, instead of the mountain going to Mahomet, and which should be certainly brought under the notice of Mission boards, as it is a course of action which appears to have hitherto been overlooked by them.

In conclusion, I beg to assure you and your readers that no one will be more glad than myself to assure both that you have heard the last from and of "IMPARTIAL OBSERVER."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

On the 12th inst., the Government granted an exequatur to Mr. Aluizio Azevedo as Vice-Consul for the Brazilian Republic, to reside at Yokohama.

An Imperial Ordinance will be issued about the middle of October—says a vernacular journal—stating that the new Tariff will come into force on the 1st January next year.

The Railway Authorities have given courteous attention to the complaint of the public by putting on a 4.50 p.m. train from Tokyo to Yokosuka. This train leaves Yokohama at 5.55 p.m., which is presumably the most convenient hour for business men desiring to proceed to their sea-side villas at Zushi or Kamakura.

On Wednesday night, about 8.40 a fire broke out in a house occupied by a curio dealer named Nagai, 52, Honcho, 3 chome. Supt. Morgin and members of the Yokohama Fire Brigade were soon on the spot, and with the assistance of the police the fire was extinguished in half an hour. Four houses were destroyed. The cause of the fire is unknown.

The Takasago reached Yokosuka safely on the 14th instant at 6.40 p.m. Her voyage had been somewhat protracted owing to heavy weather encountered in the neighbourhood of Japan. We have already given the dimensions of this fine second-class cruiser, and explained that she was built at Lord Armstrong & Co.'s yard, and that she left Newcastle, bound for Japan, on the 6th of June.

The Hawaiian Gazette, just to hand by the Gaelic, contains the following note:—S. Hirai, Acting-Consul for Japan, called at the Foreign Office yesterday morning and received from Minister Cooper a warrant on the Hawaiian Treasury for the sum of $75,000, being the amount voted by the Council of State in full settlement of the immigration dispute between Japan and this country. The money will be forwarded in the shape of bank exchange by the Gaelic to day to the Government at Tokyo.

The Marine Court of Inquiry which has been investigating the circumstances connected with the wreck of the steamer Amarapoora gave its finding on the 9th instant at Shanghai. The Court found that the vessel was lost through the negligence of William Daniel Cameron, the master commanding her, and they therefore suspended his certificate for six months, with a recommendation that a first mate's "ticket" be given to him during the period of suspension. The Court also found, inter alia, that the ship was not provided with proper charts for the voyage, and that the mate of the vessel, William de Caullieu Wetherell, did not give his evidence in an altogether satisfactory manner.

Mr. E. H. Rawson-Walker, F.R.G.S., H.B.M.'s Consul at Manila, has died of dysentery. The late Mr. Rawson-Walker was first in charge of the Consulate at Massowah in 1862. From there he was appointed Vice Consul at Tripoli, being from time to time Acting Consul-General. In 1867 he was appointed Consul at Cagliari, and in 1876 was transferred to Pernambuco. Thence he was transferred in 1879 to Cormona, and from there to Charleston, U.S.A., in 1893, and to his late post in 1895. He was the father of Mrs. Galloway, the wife of the Captain of H.M.S. Daphne. The Consulate at Manila is now in charge of Mr. Rumsden.

An employée of Messrs. Binhl Brothers, No. 24, Yokohama, named Kubo Sangoro, 16 years old, is alleged to have stolen a number of gold, and silver watches and chains valued at over yen 3,000. It is stated that he sold them to the watch dealers Matsumura Kwansuke in Matsugaicho, Saito Tomekichi in Motomachi, 5-chome, and Nagano Sankichi in Maganecho, 1 chome, for a little over yen 1,400. The thief spent the money thus gained at Hakone and other places. He and some of the dealers have been arrested.

The armoured cruiser Tokiwa, built for the Japanese navy, was launched at Elswick on 6th July. The ceremony was performed by Mme. Kato, wife of the Japanese Minister, and was witnessed by a distinguished company, including Lord Rendel and Sir Andrew Noble. The particulars of special interest in relation to the vessel are the following:—Principal dimensions—Length 408ft., breadth 67ft., draft, mean, 24ft. 4in., displacement in tons, 9 700; armament, four 8in. b.l. guns, 14 6in. q.-f. guns, 12 12-pounder q.-f. guns, seven 2½ pounder q.-f. guns, and five torpedo-tubes; armour—complete belt 7in. to 3½in., citadel 5in., casemates 6 in., barbettes 6in., conning tower 14in.; speed—24½ knots with 18 000 i.h.p. forced draft, 20 knots with 13 000 i.h.p. open stokeholds; coal supply, normal, 600 tons, full, 12,000 tons.

FIRE IN KOBE HARBOUR.

THE "BARING BROTHERS" DESTROYED.

RUMOURS OF INCENDIARISM.

Says the Kobe Chronicle of Friday last:—The full-rigged American ship Baring Bros., which arrived here a fortnight or so ago from Yokohama to load a cargo for New York, is now a complete wreck. She was loading a general cargo for Messrs. Delacamp & Co., and about three thousand tons of matting, rugs, &c., had been already shipped for the voyage. It was expected that she would be ready to sail for her destination either to-morrow or Monday. At about half-past twelve this morning smoke was observing issuing from the forward hatch, and according to the statement of two of the crew who were sleeping under the forecastle head, they were awakened by fumes coming up from the chain locker. An alarm was at once raised, and the entire crew, numbering twenty-five men, including the Captain, came on deck. It was already evident that the fire had a good hold forward, and any effort to prevent it spreading could only be made on the after side of the forward hatch, but even that could not be done with the weak appliances on the vessel, and there was nothing left but to endeavour to save what personal effects were on board, and secure the ship's papers and nautical instruments.

It was not long after the alarm that the foremast went by the board, and for two hours the flames, spreading rapidly aft, licked round the mainmast till that fell on the fore side with a terrible crash. The crew could do nothing, and when all seemed hopeless they left the ship and took refuge on board the steamer Patroclus. The officers were the last to leave.

Throughout the whole of yesterday—we are quoting the Kobe Chronicle of Saturday—the fire on the American ship Baring Brothers continued unchecked, as it was impossible to bring any fire-extinguishing appliances to play on the burning mass. Fifteen hundred tons of curios alone were stored in the holds, and 17,000 rolls of matting were on board as well as several hundred tons of rags. The whole cargo is insured, except, so the local agents inform us, that of a Japanese shipper who had several tons of curios on board, and who had intended to effect his insurance yesterday. Messrs. & Co. have made arrangements to tow the burning vessel into shallow water and there scuttle her, in the hope of saving some portion of the ship's fittings, but the task will be an extremely risky one, for it is considered by those best able to judge that nothing but the bare hulk can possibly be saved. The United States Consul held a formal inquiry at the Consulate yesterday morning at which the statements of some of the crew were taken down. Nothing definite can be gathered as to the origin of the fire, and notwithstanding that every possible step has been taken to glean some clue, the whole thing is wrapped in mystery. That it originated in the fore part of the vessel there is not the slightest doubt, and what makes the mystery more complete is that the forward hatch was locked the whole of Thursday, and not a single coolie had access to that part of the hold on that day. The only way access could be obtained was by way of the chain locker, from whence the smoke was first observed. The ill-fated vessel is owned by Mr. E. E. O'Brien of Thomaston, Maine, who also owns the Alexander Gibson and the Y. B. Walker, both of which trade regularly to the Far East. The Baring Brothers was estimated to be worth at least U.S. $250,000, although she has been sailing for over twenty years. Captain Smalley says he does not believe she is insured at all, for her owner has had other vessels lost in a similar manner, and they had not been covered by insurance. This is the second time the Captain has been burnt out, for in the Mary O'Brien some time ago his cargo of coal became ignited, and resulted in the complete loss of the vessel.

The Captain feels his loss acutely and yesterday afternoon said it had been a severe blow to him. Besides losing his interest in the vessel, he has to suffer the additional loss of a large quantity of sailors' clothing and other things which make it extremely unfortunate for him.

The principal shippers of the cargo are Messrs. Vautine & Co., and Heyn, Brockelmann & Co., who, as we have already stated, are fully covered by insurance.

Sworn at Yokohama this eleventh day of August 1898, before me

(signed) RALPH G. E. FORSTER,
Acting Assistant Judge,
H.B.M. Court for Japan.

Mr. Litchfield, Crown Prosecutor in Japan, appeared for the prosecution.

His Honour, to Accused—Have you any counsel?—Yes, your Honour. Professor Terry; but he has not yet returned from Karuizawa. I have telegraphed to him and expect him back to-morrow. I beg to apply to the Court for a postponement of the hearing until Mr. Terry returns.

His Honour—Have you any objection, Mr. Litchfield?

Mr. Litchfield—If accused wants time to prepare his defence I have no objection to a postponement. At the same time, I am ready to go on if necessary.

After a brief consultation between all parties, it was decided to remand the case until Tuesday next, the 16th instant.

Accused said he begged to apply to the Court for bail.

His Honour—Any application for bail will be heard in chambers.

The Court then rose.

(TUESDAY, August 16th.)

Charles Emil Leopold appeared on a charge of obtaining moneys on false pretences from the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Mr. H. C. Litchfield prosecuted, having with him Mr. J. F. Lowder; Professor Terry appeared for the defence, and Mr. A. B. Walford watched the case on behalf of the Bank.

Mr. Litchfield applied for an amendment of some clerical errors which had crept into the charge. The sum of yen 29,235 55 should be yen 29,938.58; the sum of yen 9,770 97, alleged to have been obtained on February 15th, 1898, should be yen 9,770 99; the sum alleged to have been obtained on February 21st should be, instead of yen 19,541 99, two sums of yen 10,992.36 and yen 8,549 63, the latter sum having been applied for on the 21st, but not paid over till the 24th. Further, the two sums of yen 17,012.66, alleged to have been received on April 7th, should in each case be yen 17,055 82.

In opening for the prosecution, Mr. Litchfield said the statute which regulated the case was 24th and 25th Victoria, chapter 96, sections 88 and 89. The accused was in the employ of Messrs. Ahrens & Co., or rather the successors of Messrs. Ahrens & Co., a firm which carried on a large import, but no export trade; they were also agents for the Norddeutscher Lloyd and the London Insurance Company, which he should for the purposes of that enquiry treat as a Marine Insurance Company. Leopold had been for the last twelve years chief of the shipping department of the firm and of the Marine Insurance work. In fact, much confidence had been reposed in him, and he might be said to have managed the shipping and insurance business of the firm. At the end of last year Leopold announced that he was making shipments of furs to London, and as the firm was not an export firm he was allowed to do this export business on his own account with the sanction and knowledge of the firm. The first item of the charge was that Leopold obtained on the 31st December yen 12,182 by false pretences, this sum being put to his credit by the bank on his representation to the manager that he had by the steamer Hohenzollern shipped ten cases of furs, and on his presenting a bill of lading and a marine insurance policy purporting that the goods were actually shipped. He should show them that Leopold under a letter of credit from a London firm trading as C. M. Lampson and Co., was authorised to sell to the bank bills of exchange on consignments of furs and skins shipped to Messrs. Lampson and Co. Under this arrangement the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank paid Mr. Leopold's trading bills, and put the proceeds in Japanese money to the credit of his account. The conditions under which he was allowed to draw were that he should hand to the bank complete documents such as bills of lading, &c., showing that the goods were actually shipped. On the 31st December, Leopold drew a bill of exchange for £1,250, and on the same day wrote the Bank a letter in which he enclosed complete details of the bills of lading, described the marks and numbers on the packages, and gave the name of the consignees. The applications to the bank on subsequent occasions were always accompanied by letters in almost identical terms, except in the matter of numbers, the amounts applied for, &c. The letter and the bill of exchange were accompanied by the bill of lading, the marks and numbers on which corresponded with those in the letter and the invoice which represented that the furs were shipped. There also followed a policy of insurance for £2,000 in the London Insurance Company. Mr. Leopold, in fact, fulfilled all the conditions under which he was entitled to draw on Lampson & Co.—who he was informed were a most respectable firm. Only one thing seemed to have been neglected, and that was that he did not send the furs on board the Hohenzollern. These bills of lading purported to show that the goods were shipped, and they bore the signature of one of the partners of Ahrens & Co., and the prosecution had to prove that though the documents were correct they did not represent, as they were alleged to represent, the fact that these furs had been shipped to London. It would be necessary to explain the system of shipping adopted at Messrs. Ahrens and Co.'s. The firm had an agreement with the Pier Landing and Lighter Company, a firm of Japanese contractors, through which all cargo entitled to be sent by the steamers of the N. D. Lloyd was handled and passed on to the steamer, with the exception only of treasure shipments. The custom pursued was this. The intending shipper makes application for a shipping order for goods. He is given forms on blue paper in duplicate which describe the marks and numbers of the goods he wishes to ship. He is also supplied at the same time with blank forms of bills of lading. With those two forms in blue he takes his goods to the Pier Company. The Pier Company takes the goods, keeps one of the blue forms, and returns to the shipper the duplicate —signed by the Pier Company. The shipper then fills up the bills of lading, returns both to Messrs. Ahrens & Co., and the bill of lading is signed. It is first of all checked in the shipping office with the blue form, and then if it is correct it is passed in to the private office of the partners and is signed by them. Sometimes these bills of lading come in large numbers for signature, and the partners are naturally in the habit of trusting to the clerks that the details are accurate, it being of course impossible to check each of these bills before signing. The Pier Company are provided by Ahrens and Co. with books of forms in white paper. One of these forms is filled in by the Pier Company to correspond with the blue form, and this with the cargo is forwarded to the ship. The officer on duty on receiving the cargo signs the form and returns it to the company, and the company eventually delivers the form to Messrs. Ahrens & Co. with the officer's signature. These forms not returning, however, until after the steamer has left, the manifest for the steamer is made up from the blue forms and bills of lading. After the steamer has left the white forms come in and these are checked with the copies of the manifest remaining in the hands of Ahrens and Co. If these shipments of which Mr. Leopold's letter spoke were genuine shipments there should be found in the hands of Ahrens and Co. or of the Pier Company these forms of shipment. There were found in a drawer of the office which Mr. Leopold indicated to another clerk copies of the bills of lading which in the case of genuine shipments should not have been in Yokohama at all. On receipt of a telegram from Bremen concerning the matter one of the partners, Mr. Hofmann, had an interview with Leopold and informed him of the purport of the message and asked for an explanation. His Honour would be informed by Mr. Hofmann what statements were made in reply. When he had laid before his Honour in evidence the inducements by which the bank had made these advances he should ask for an order for the trial of the accused before a higher court.

George Kircher, Constable of the British Consulate, was then called. He said Leopold was of British nationality. He served a warrant on Leopold at No. 59.

Henry William Fraser described himself as chief clerk, looking after the outward business of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank. He meant by that that he attended to outward business in bills of exchange. In the case of a documentary bill his custom was to [illegible] that the bill was duly signed, that the date was right, and that the documents attached were as represented; also, if the bill were drawn under a letter of credit, he would see that it corresponded with the terms of credit, and (should exchange be settled) that it was paid for at the proper rate of exchange. He knew Leopold. He was one of the clients of the Bank. Witness knew his signature. Witness had been in Yokohama almost three years. In December last Leopold presented a letter of credit from Messrs. C. M. Lampson and Company, of London. It authorised Mr. Leopold to draw bills of exchange, with the shipping documents, attached, for furs as directed by them. On 31st December he received a letter from Mr. Leopold on the subject of the letter of credit (the letter put in). He also received a bill of exchange signed by Leopold (produced). He marked the letter with blue pencil to show that the figures corresponded with the documents annexed, and the equivalent of the sum of £1,250 in yen for ten cases of furs was placed to Leopold's credit in the bank books. Witness identified the endorsement of the bill of lading (produced) as in the handwriting of Leopold, and also the invoices and insurance forms, the marks and figures in which corresponded. By these documents he understood that the goods had been shipped by the steamer. The bank was induced to purchase the bill, drawn by Leopold, because everything appeared in order, including the letter of credit.

At this point Professor Terry suggested that to shorten this examination, he might admit the documents, and they might be put in. He suggested this merely with a view of shortening the examination; of course he said nothing as to the trial.

Mr. Lowder said he did not think they could take admissions of counsel in a criminal case. He was afraid that they would have to go through each item, tedious as the process was.

Mr. Forster—You see the other party does not want it.

Professor Terry—Very well. Let us go on.

Mr. Litchfield then put before witness the documents referring to transactions on the same date, 31st December, referring to 40 other cases of fur and involving yen 29,238; 8th January, yen 7,309; 9th February, yen 28,091; 15th February, yen 9,770; 19th February, yen 10,992 and yen 8,549; 7th April, yen 17,055 and yen 17,055. Prior to the 31st December Leopold's banking account was overdrawn. He was allowed to overdraw on the condition that the bills of exchange came to the bank.

Witness continued that these eight bills of lading had been sent back to Yokohama from London. With regard to the transaction of February 19th, credit was not given to Leopold for the sum immediately, as his credit was overdrawn, by the latter sum of yen 8,549 but a day or two after his credit was extended by wire from London from £5,000 to £10,000; and consequently the other sums were placed to his credit.

The Court then adjourned. On resuming, witness said there was a change in the system of keeping Leopold's accounts after the 31st December. Up to the 31st December the account was overdrawn before the bills came in to the bank, but subsequently this was not so; he meant that the cheques were not passed until the bills were delivered to the bank.

By Professor Terry—It was not witness who decided whether the bills should be bought. The manager (Mr. Bevis) decided that. The first of the credits of Lampson and Co. was by wire, as well as the second increasing it to £10,000. Those telegrams he presumed were in the bank; they came in code and were translated; the originals were filed away, the others were put in the safe. The bank had not received any advice that the bills had not been paid; they were not all due yet. No notice had been received this end at all. The bills were in three parts, the first went forward immediately by the first mail to the London office, and the second by the next mail; the third was retained by the Bank here. The first and second parts had not returned to Japan, and in the ordinary course it should be now in London.

By Mr. Lowder—The manager decided whether to purchase a bill, and then it was sent into witness's office. He recognised the contract produced as one entered into between Leopold and the bank, through a Mr. Parsons, broker. He identified another similar contract with Messrs. St. John and Daniel as brokers, for £3,000, and another with the name of Mr. Blad as broker.

By Mr. Terry—All the negotiations were not through brokers, but he never remembered Mr. Leopold coming to the office personally; when the bills did not come through brokers they were sent in Ahrens' chit-book.

Albert Hofman, a German subject and a partner in H. Ahrens and Co., Nachf., said besides their business as merchants they were agents for the Norddeutscher Lloyd and the London Assurance Corporation—a marine, fire, and life company. He was here with Mr. Wismer conducting the business of the firm last December, and he remained till the 20th January, when he went down to Kobe to take charge there. Mr. Leopold was controller of the shipping and insurance departments at Yokohama. Witness had known him since 1886. The firm signed bills of lading as agents for the N. Lloyd; they did not sign for the master. The firm signed for the Insurance Company on their own authority as agents. He identified his signature for the firm on the bills of lading and the insurance policies produced. He did not remember the circumstances under which he signed these documents; there were very many such papers to sign, and he could not take very great notice of any particular one. Bills of lading came into the private office for signature after they had been checked in the clerks' office; principals trusted to everything being in order when they attached their signatures. Witness went down to Kobe in January, and returned to Yokohama about the end of April. He then saw Leopold at the German Hospital, and showed him a telegram the firm had received from London asking explanations concerning certain packages of furs not come to hand. These telegrams were from the head office of the N. D. Lloyd at Bremen. Leopold admitted that the goods has not been shipped, but promised to do everything to satisfy the firm, so that they wouldn't lose anything. He produced an account of other transactions and also gave witness an approximate account of his assets. The paper (produced) was written at Leopold's dictation by a Mr. Harmssen, another clerk. Witness took the letter produced (in Leopold's hand writing) from the hospital with him. It stated Leopold undertook to keep his assets for Mr. Wismer's account, and that they would be more than sufficient to pay off the money. Leopold was very sick at the time, and conversation was very difficult. He gave no reasons for his course of action. He gave them his ideas as to what answer to telegraph to Bremen. His idea was that they should wire that the goods were detained at shippers' request, that the matter had been settled there, that things had been arranged between Leopold and Lampson, that the goods had been resold in Yokohama, and explanations would follow by mail. This telegram, however, was not sent by the firm, as it did not correspond with the truth. He had not heard from Leopold any explanation as to the statements made in the suggested telegram. Another telegram was, however, sent afterwards.

At this point the Court adjourned till this morning, an application for bail being heard in chambers.

Wednesday, August 17th.

The hearing of the charges against Charles Emil Leopold was continued this morning. Mr. Litchfield and Mr. Lowder again appeared for the prosecution; Mr. Terry defended; and Mr. A. B. Walford watched the case for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Fukushima Cheichi, a Japanese employé of Ahrens and Co., Nachf., was called and examined by Mr. Lowder. Shown the documents already placed before the Court he pointed out the portions which were in his handwriting, viz., several letters to the bank, bills of lading, and invoices. He wrote them by the instructions of Leopold, and after writing them he gave them to Leopold.

Ogata Buekichi, also employed as a clerk in Ahrens and Co.'s, identified several documents—marine insurance policies, letters to the bank, bills of lading, and invoices—as in his handwriting. He wrote them by instructions of Mr. Leopold. He handed them when they were finished sometimes to Mr. Leopold and sometimes to Mr. Harmssen. They were all written in copying ink.

Emil Wismer, partner in the firm of Ahrens & Co., Nachf., said the accused was in his employ in the month of December last, and he continued in his employ up to the 9th or 10th of May, 1898. He had been more than twenty years in the employ of the new firm and of the old firm. The present firm was formed in January, 1887. Leopold was the manager of the shipping office and the insurance department. When bills of lading and such documents came in for witness's signature he signed them trusting that the details were correct. It would be impossible for him to examine into each document before signing it. He identified his signature for the firm on a number of documents—bills of lading and insurance polices—produced. On April 9th the firm received a telegram from the head office of the Norddeutscher Lloyd at Bremen. He identified Lampson London claim 133 packages furs shipped by Leopold Yokohama December January. Do you know their whereabouts? Immediate answer required.

In answer to that this telegram was eventually despatched:—

Shipments postponed. Leopold wiring Lampson. Suspend claims.

This answer was sent on the suggestion of Leopold, who was seen in the hospital by Mr. Harmssen. On the form of bill of exchange (produced) he saw the words "Ahrens and Co., London and Japan." This was the style of the old firm and the forms were not now in use. He did not know before that these forms had been used by anyone in the office. Leopold had no right to use them in his private business. About the beginning of May witness went to see Leopold at the hospital. Witness spoke to him about the goods not having gone forward. He did not give witness any satisfactory explanation; he simply said that everything would be settled later on, and that the firm would not lose a cent. He admitted that the goods referred to in the telegram had not been forwarded. Soon after witness had seen Leopold he received a letter (produced) from him. The first part was a letter from another party to Leopold, and read as follows:—

Phœnix Saw Mills, Nakamura.

Dear Mr. LEOPOLD,—The following telegram has just arrived from Lampson. "Ship goods or send remittance to cover goods."

A. G. DOUGLAS LLOYD.

Then in accused's handwriting was the following:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—Above wire arrived just after you left. From my knowledge of the people I believe them to be satisfied. They only want to push me. I shall wire tomorrow noon as follows, by which time you may have heard something from London; "Deliveries will be completed within (?) ten days; therefore kindly allow me this time."

LEOPOLD.

P.S.—I know the people, and am perfectly certain that the matter is in order.

Witness received a second letter about the same time as follows:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—I thank you for wiring the £5 000, which will, I am sure, satisfy Lampson's for the present. I have several drafts due on the 2nd May with my brother in London. I think about £3 500, of which he has sold £2,000, leaving a balance of £1,500, which should be paid on Monday. I shall esteem it a great favour if you will instruct London to pay him, goods or warrants to be handed to London office. This will prevent my credit being entirely spoiled at the Chartered Bank. It is bad enough now. I assure you that I shall do everything to get out of the mess as quickly as possible.

Yours truly, LEOPOLD.

The witness explained, as to the reference to wiring the £5 000, for which Leopold expressed his thanks, that it was done at the verbal request of Leopold to Mr. Hofmann. The money was wired to their London office to pay Lampson. Leopold told Mr. Hofmann that about that amount was due on the 2nd or 3rd of May against shipments of furs not made. The firm agreed to this because they as agents of the Nordderd-cher Lloyd were the finally responsible parties owing to their signature to the bills of lading. Besides, Mr. Leopold promised Mr. Hofmann verbally to refund them this amount in about a week or so by selling the Phœnix Saw Mill, which, believing his statements, the firm thought was his own property. He told them he could sell the mill for that amount in a week or two. About the same time, the beginning of May, witness received another letter from the accused. It read as follows:—

"Will the Bank make the renewal Monday due? Bank refuses to make the loan if not guaranteed. Moseley declines without definite instructions. Remit all you can £1500."

Dear Mr. WISMER and HOFMANN.—Above is a wire I have received from my brother. The bank will apparently make the loan if guaranteed by you. The best way out of the trouble is to remit, which I trust you will be able to do.

Yours, E. LEOPOLD

Witness (in reply to Mr. Lowder):—The brother referred to must have been representing the accused's firm in London. Moseley is Ahrens and Co.'s Manager in London. The telegram produced is a copy of a telegram sent by Ahrens & Co., Yokohama, to Ahrens and Co., London.

Mr. Lowder read the telegram as follows:—

We have Digitized by Google with Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation—£1500

Pay Leopold against warrants. We have opened credit in your favour with Chartered Bank £5,000 Lampson.—Ahrens.

The witness explained that the word "Lampson" meant "to be paid to Lampson." This telegram was sent to meet the urgent wishes of the accused. The following reply was received from their London branch:—

Leopold's warrants consist entirely of wall paper, on which no careful persons would advance money. What shall we do with the £1,500? Telegraph immediately.

The Yokohama office thereupon replied:—

£1,500 do not pay, wait further instructions.

The following letter, undated, was received by witness from the accused about the beginning of May:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—My brother just wires me that he can manage with £800, therefore please do wire this amount to London, so that I can square off the bills. I thought the matter was in order and told the bank so. By wiring above I can settle with them here easier.

Yours, E. LEOPOLD.

Mr. Lowder:—Did you wire £800 as requested?

Witness:—No.

Mr. Lowder then proposed to put in another letter from Leopold of a date about the 9th or 10th May, but Mr. Terry objected that it was immaterial. His Honour, however, held that it was admissible, and the letter was read as follows:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—Kindly keep back the advertisement till to-morrow if possible, as I wish to inform some of my friends personally. I trust you will word the advertisement so that I shall not be entirely ruined before the Yokohama community, as I am trying to raise mortgages on the Saw Mills and other property.

Yours, E. LEOPOLD.

Mr. Lowder—What was this advertisement?

Witness explained that it was an advertisement the firm were thinking of publishing announcing Leopold's dismissal from their employ. The advertisement, however, was never published.

At this point an adjournment was made.

On resuming, witness stated that in the early part of May he called on accused for a list of his assets. Witness received the letter produced and the list of assets.

Mr. Lowder read them as follows:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—I beg to hand you the list required. The original list which I handed to Mr. Hofmann was a complete one of my assets and I told him at the time that I owed the Chartered Bank yen 54,000 (or 64 000—the first figure being very indistinct). I have therefore made out a new list for the Chartered and have used for them the goods or properties which will take longest to realise. You need not tell them that. I have used the Nakamura and Sugamo-cho properties, which are very difficult to sell with the lease to you. I could get any price for the lot provided they were empty. The lighters in course of construction will be two months before we can deliver, also other work. I will get you the title deeds as quickly as possible. I hope to sell the saw mills outright. They will bring at least yen 100,000 as a going concern. The land is also well in hand.

E. LEOPOLD.

Attached to this letter was a list of accused's assets, which he stated that he assigned to Ahrens & Co. The list was as follows:—

	Yen.
Phœnix Saw Mills	80,000
Yoshihama-cho shed and lease	1,000
House and Godown in Japanese Town ...	2 500
Land in Kanazawa	1,100
Paper manufactory in Tokyo.....	4,000
(These are all in Mr. Uyeda's name).
Yoshida Shinden land, outlay on loans ...	37.000
(In Messrs. Uyeda's and Gisa's name).
Claim London Assurance Company.....	30,000
Various unsold stocks in London	30,000
Sundry amounts owing to me	3 000
Shares	12,000
Skins, coal, wood, and other goods unsold.	36,000
No. 59 furniture, dwelling house, and offices	3 500

Besides this he (the accused) assigned all profits made on the above businesses, estimated to amount to between yen 60,000 and yen 70,000.

By Professor Terry—The telegrams he had produced were press copies; they had the originals in their possession.

Witness, on having his evidence read over, made a correction as to the use of the old forms marked, "Ahrens and Co., Japan and London." He said he had since found that these forms were occasionally used, but only now and then, and then the word "Nachf." was always added to "Ahrens and Company."

Johann Andreas Harmssen, a German subject, and clerk in the employ of Ahrens and Co., Nachf., said he was assistant to Leopold in both shipping and insurance departments. With regard to the shipping business of the N. D. Lloyd the firm had a contract with a Japanese firm called the Pier Traffic and Lighter Company. The Pier Company had to receive cargo and forward it to the steamers in port. Under exceptional circumstances shippers shipped cargo direct; but generally speaking it went through the Pier Company. When a shipper wished to put cargo on board he received a blue form from Ahrens and Co. The form was in three parts. One was filed in the office and the others handed to the shipper, and taken to the Pier Company. One of them was afterwards returned to the firm by the shipper, with the Pier Company's signature attached to it. At the time they gave the shipper the blue forms they also gave him bills of lading. The bills of lading were generally filled up by the shipper. The bills of lading were in sets of four. The blue form bearing the Pier Company's signature was looked upon as a receipt for the cargo by the Pier Company. Before the bills of lading were taken to the partners for signature they were checked by the blue forms either by himself or Leopold—generally by himself. Three parts of the four of which the bill of lading was composed were generally signed, and the fourth was called the Captain's copy and was kept in the office until the departure of the steamer. Before the steamer left they had to prepare a manifest of the cargo. It was made up from the Captain's copy of the bill of lading—generally by a Japanese clerk. They supplied the Pier Company with a book of forms on white paper, one of which, after the cargo had been signed for on board by the second officer, was returned to the office of Ahrens and Co. This was called the mate's receipt. The copy of the manifest kept in the office was checked by the blue and white receipts after the departure of the steamer. At the end of April witness went to see Leopold at the hospital. It was in consequence of a telegram from Bremen. He informed accused of the contents of the telegram. He visited him on another occasion in company with Mr. Hofmann, and they had a general conversation about the non-shipping of the furs and the best means of getting out of the difficulty. Leopold proposed to send a telegram which witness took down on the wish of Mr. Hofmann at Leopold's dictation. The paper produced was in witness's handwriting, with the exception of the first line, which was written by Leopold, who was, however, too ill to continue. When they heard at the office that these furs were missing they immediately tried to trace them.

A huge pile of ship's manifests was here produced ranging over the dates covered by the charge, and the witness examined them, with the result that he found no mention of furs with Leopold as the shipper or with the mark of Lampson's, an L and an I in a diamond. He also examined the counterfoils of the books of blue forms given to shippers with the same result.

The Court had not nearly got through this when an adjournment was made till this morning.

BAIL.

Application for a renewal of bail was made in chambers during the afternoon and the sureties offered were accepted. They were Messrs. J. W. Cam and Binting and Captain Forbes in the sum of yen 10,000 each, and the accused himself in the sum of yen 40,000.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 18.

The hearing of the charge against Charles Emil Leopold was resumed this morning, counsel appearing as before—Mr. H. C. Litchfield and Mr. J. F. Lowder for the prosecution, Professor Terry for the defence, and Mr. A. B. Walford for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Johann Andreas Harmssen was recalled, and examined further as to shipping documents—bills of lading and ship's manifests—during the term covered by the charge. There were many shipments in the name of Leopold, but he could only trace two referring to furs, one of April 14th regarding the shipment of eight bales and thirteen packages, and a further shipment of six cases. For these there was the mate's receipt. He had been unable to find traces in the firm's books of the other bills of lading which had been supplied to the bank.

The whole of the morning was taken up with Original documents. In the afternoon the witness described the method of issuing assurance policies.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

He said they had application forms which the person who desired to be insured had to fill up. Sometimes, however, applications were made in an ordinary letter, or even verbally to any European in the shipping office, in which case the particulars were put down on a piece of paper, and the policy was afterwards written out in accordance with the particulars by a Japanese employe. They were then copied. After they had been written out by a Japanese clerk they were checked by himself or Mr. Leopold, and if in order initialled by the party checking them. Witness was then taken through a number of policies already laid before the Court and questioned as to the initialling and checking of them. Some of them he recognised as having checked himself; others he believed to be checked by Mr. Leopold. He believed, though he was not quite sure, that no premium had been paid on all these policies. Bills had been made out and presented to Mr. Leopold for these premia. Bills had not been made out for the freight with regard to the bills of lading produced. Bills of freight were made out immediately after the departure of the ship, and unless the goods were on the manifest Ahrens and Co. would have no official notice of the goods having been shipped. Witness wished to correct a statement made the previous day respecting the blue forms issued to shippers. The blue forms of shipping orders and the blank sets of bills of lading were taken back by the shipper to the shipping office, and they had no particular notice of the time when the goods were sent to the Pier Company.

Mr. Terry had no questions to ask.

Yamaguchi Toshisuge, clerk in the employ of Ahrens & Co., Nachf., identified certain insurance policies as in his handwriting. He wrote them in accordance with instructions from Leopold.

Tanaka Tamejiro, another clerk, identified several bills of exchange as in his handwriting. He had been ordered to write them by Mr. Leopold.

Mr. Lowder intimated that there were three more witnesses for the prosecution, but they were not in attendance, and he suggested that their evidence should be taken next day.

The case was therefore again adjourned to 11 a.m. to-day.

BRITISH AND GERMAN INTERESTS IN CHINA.

IMPORTANT STATEMENT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

London, Aug 11.

Mr. Curzon, replying to questions in the House of Commons on China, expressed his gratitude for the support of the House in the matter, adding that no aggression had been threatened. Sir Claude MacDonald cabled on the 2nd February that the German Minister at Peking opposed the concession for the trunk-line from Chinkiang, on the ground that no railway must be constructed in Shantung without previous arrangement with Germany. Great Britain then lodged a protest at Pekin and Berlin. To this Germany replied that the facts had been misrepresented. It was only demanded that, if China required assistance in Shantung, she should first offer the work to Germans. Germany did not claim any exclusive privileges in China, and had made no attempt to exclude other nations from free competition in Shantung. Instructions to resist any preferential treatment of foreign subjects in trade, Mr. Curzon added, had been sent to Sir Claude Macdonald in March last, and renewed particular instructions with regard to railway concessions had been forwarded on the 13th July.

LIVELY DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

CHINA AFFAIRS.

London, Aug. 12.

In the House of Commons, Sir Charles Dilke raised a China debate. He complained that France, Russia and Germany were closing their spheres, while Britain had expected an open door for everybody. Sir William Harcourt said the real difficulty was to ascertain the policy of the Government. He complained of its reticence. Mr. Balfour, First Lord of the Treasury, in reply said it could not be pretended that this Empire either alone or in alliance with another Empire could prevent the legitimate development of other commercial and military empires. Though England may not anticipate maintaining her old relative superiority in China, it may be expected that the volume of trade will increase as rapidly in the future as it had done in the past. The question of trade was distinct from the question of concessions. No evidence, he added, existed of any intention to erect barriers against British goods. He saw no necessity to take a pessimist view with regard to Russia, and he would be surprised if English concessionaires did not obtain their full share.

Notes by Gunsberg.

(a) The counter gambit is met best by 3—P takes P, P to K 5; 4—P to Q 3; and if 4....., K Kt to B 3; 5—P takes P, Kt takes P; 6—Q to Kt 2.

(b) Not favourable as the sequel shows. He should play at once P to Q 4, and if ..... P takes P, retake with the Bishop.

(c) White, being behind in development, has already a bad game. To exchange the threatening Queen's Knight would not mend matters, as after 10....., P takes Kt, he has to guard against 11....., B to ■ 4, ch, following by ....., Kt to Kt 5, as well as against the loss of QBP by 12....., R to K sq.

(d) If 12—B takes Kt, Q takes B ch; 13—K to R sq, B to Kt 5; 14—Q to Q 3, Q takes KP. White, therefore, gives up the exchange for an attack, which, however, is but short-lived.

(e) Black defends himself with consummate skill. With the displacing of the Bishop, the back-bone of the attack is broken, and the Rook reaches the seventh rank, having gained a whole move.

(f) In order to take the KtP, should it advance.

(g) Cutting of the King from escaping via B sq.

(h) With the advent of this knight, the battle is decided. White evidently has no time for R to B 7 because of ....., R to Q 8 ch and R to B 8 ch.

(i) Most players would resign. Blackburne, however, sees a spark of hope.

(k) The secret plan is now revealed. If 41....., P Queens, White is stalemated. Mr. Blackburne has become very unsophisticated to spring such traps in a tournament game, or did he imagine himself playing skittles at the Divan, one shilling apiece?

(a) Bravo! Walbrodt. Here is a man after our own heart. Amusing, isn't it, to compare the condemnation so many writers are fond of hurling at the gambits with the number of victories they win.

(b) It will amuse our readers to work out the mate in this position; and it would be instructive to know where and how the powerful English master would vary his play if he had it to do over again.

Notes.

The Chess Editor of the Hongkong Press suggests giving his readers two or three problems weekly in future instead of the usual one. We ourselves find that one problem is too much for our solvers, whose enthusiasm seems to vanish with the heat. We notice similar complaints in other Chess columns, notably the Literary Digest's from which we cull many problems.

The absence of the names of very many of our solvers has been very noticeable lately, says that paper. The war, the hot weather, and other disturbing conditions may in some instances account for this; but we know that the character of the problems has a great deal to do with the state of affairs. When we published problems that were not very difficult, then many found the solution and condemned the problems as "too easy"; "give us something harder," etc. Now, when we give more difficult compositions, there isn't a word heard along the whole line.

One of our solvers writes:—"The Digest's 3-ers are too difficult under atmospheric conditions." Several correspondents, who have not been able to solve some of the problems, declare that they are unsound. It has been, and is, the purpose of this Department to select the best problems we can get. Best problems are not always difficult, but if this feature is lacking they have other characteristics of excellence. "Miron," in the New York Clipper, calls attention to the "startling low stand American problem art has taken in the B.C.M's. recent tourney." He discovered that "there were 10 American entrants, with 20 problems—nearly one fifth of the whole." He tells us that 9 were disqualified, 8 received less than 40 per cent. of merit-marks, while only one received 50 per cent. and over. He says that the very low standard of American problems is "the fruit (better, punishment) of those editors who have so long and persistently insisted on feeding their readers out of Caissa's nursing-bottle, through fear of weak heads and tender stomachs."

THE GREATEST WONDER OF MODERN TIMES

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

PERSONS suffering from weak or debilitated constitutions will discover that by the use of this wonderful medicine there is "Health for all." The blood is the fountain of life, and its purity can be maintained by the use of these Pills

Sir Samuel Baker, in his work entitled "The Nile Tributaries in Abyssinia," says—"I ordered the dragoman Mahomet to inform the Fakir that I was a Doctor, and I had the best medicines at the service of the sick, with advice gratis. In a short time I had many applicants, to whom I served out a quantity of Holloway's Pills. These are most useful to an explorer, as, possessing unmistakable purgative properties, they create an undeniable effect upon the patient, which satisfies them of their value."

SIMPLE, SAFE, AND CERTAIN.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT

Is a certain remedy for bad legs, bad breasts, and ulcerations of all kinds. It acts miraculously in healing ulcerations, curing skin diseases, and in arresting and subduing all inflammations.

Mr. J. T. Cooper, in his account of his extraordinary travels in China, published in 18—, says—"I had with me a quantity of Holloway's Ointment. I gave some to the people, and nothing could exceed their gratitude; and, in consequence, milk, fowls, butter, and horse feed poured in upon us, until at last a teaspoonful of Ointment was worth a fowl and any quantity of peas, and the demand became so great that I was obliged to lock up the small remaining "stock."

Sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors throughout the World. May 21st, 1898.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor, at 51, Main Street, Settlement, by Arthur Bellamy Brown, of No. 7-c, Kiaff, Yokohama.—Saturday, August 20, 1898.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

There is some excitement about the settlement of the Hawaiian affair, and it seems not improbable that there will be more. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun has taken up the subject with much vehemence. It considers that Japan has been humiliated and that the Government would be most reprehensible if it failed to take some further action. Our contemporary's point is that, though Hawaii has paid a certain sum to Japan apparently by way of compensation, she has accompanied the payment with declarations that it is made, not at all in recognition of Japan's right to receive money or of Hawaii's obligation to pay money, but simply in deference to the clearly, almost peremptorily, expressed wishes of the United States. In voting the appropriation to make the payment, the Hawaiian Council of State read a declaration of the Cabinet to the effect that, "in view of the expressed desire of the United States that we (the Hawaiian Government) should dispose of the issue between this country and Japan, and in view of Japan's offer to compromise the matter for $75 000 (gold), the offer be accepted as a compromise * * * without any admission of liability or wrongful act on the part of Hawaii, and without the waiving of any principle hitherto contended for in the matter." The Nichi Nichi further alludes to the following statements made at the meeting of the Hawaiian Council of State on July 19th:—

President Dole made a brief statement. He said this course was adopted in accordance with the express request made to Minister Hatch by the administration at Washington that the matter be disposed of finally before the sovereignty of this country went to the control of the United States. The American Minister resident here had made the same request in a more definite manner. The Cabinet here felt that the President of the United States and his advisers had strong, good, and sufficient reasons upon which the request to Hawaii was based. These reasons were not fully known to Mr. Dole and his Ministers. There had been repugnance to the thought of making a cash settlement with Japan for the reason that it was felt Hawaii had been right, had acted in good faith, and had been fully justified in every way in each step taken. The Cabinet had agreed that it was best and proper to listen to the United States, and that probably a wrong would be done and a mistake made, if there was failure to do this. The settlement will be accomplished with a full and proper recognition of the principles contended for by Hawaii. In fine, it is purely a matter of compromise at the request of the United States and made in order that the United States may not inherit the dispute.

Minister Hatch said that he had been requested to call at the State Department at Washington the day after the joint resolution of annexation passed by the Senate. Here it was the earnest desire of President McKinley that this matter be settled or compromised. Details were not entered into, but it was apparent that there were important reasons of State behind the request. There had been no intimation that the Government here was wrong in the premises. On the contrary, there had been informal assurance that it was believed Hawaii was right as to the legal side of the question. It was pointed out that Hawaii did not or need not admit or concede liability and that nothing in the settlement could be so construed. Mr. Hatch felt that serious considerations had moved President McKinley to make the request, and that it was understood to be the wish of the administration at Washington that the question of right or wrong in the case itself should be set aside entirely in making the compromise settlement. Later the same day both the Hawaiian and Japanese Ministers at the same time were addressed by the Secretary of State upon the affair and a clear understanding reached. Mr. Hatch had been requested to present the matter to his government and had done so upon his arrival here. This correspondence was next read:—

Legation of the United States,
Honolulu, H I., July 26 h, 1898

Honorable HENRY E. COOPER,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, Honolulu.

SIR:—I have the honour to inform you that I have received instructions from my Government expressing anxiety to secure an immediate solution of the question at issue between Hawaii and Japan whereby the approaching transfer of Hawaiian territory would be freed from any ultimate questions tending to embarrass it in its dealings with a third power.

The instructions assume that to this end and as the only means of accomplishing it your Government will close the incident by the payment to Japan of a reasonable indemnity.

It is not to be understood that this course of action is urged by the Government of the United States on any other grounds than as a necessary preliminary to the formal transfer of sovereignty which is now awaited.

The instructions make it clear that until this action is taken by Hawaii a serious obstacle will exist to the execution of the instructions which Rear Admiral Miller may bring to me at any time. I do not need to point out to you how unfortunate from every point of view would be further delay in effecting the consummation which both our Governments so earnestly wish.

My instructions are imperative to do all I can to bring about as speedily as possible this desired adjustment.

Under all the circumstances, and having regard to common interests, I venture to express the hope that you will lose no time in securing the compliance of the Hawaiian Executive with the view of the Government at Washington.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

(Sig.) HAROLD M. SEWALL.
Honolulu, 29th July, 1898.

SIR:—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant.

The matter of effecting a settlement of the pending controversy between Hawaii and Japan which arose through the action of this Government in refusing to allow certain Japanese subjects to land in this country, has had the serious consideration of the Executive Council.

In view of the urgent request made in your letter and actuated by a sincere desire to comply with the wishes of the Government of the United States in the matter, it has been decided to accept the offer of the Japanese Government to compromise by the payment of seventy-five thousand dollars.

The Council of State at its meeting to-morrow will be requested to appropriate the money for that purpose.

Allow me to say, however, in closing that it is not without regret that my Government finds itself in this position, believing that the action of refusing admission to the Japanese subjects was a matter of political and economic necessity, authorized by our laws, which have been carefully and correctly administered and for which, under ordinary circumstances, no compensation is due to Japan, payment being made by this Government solely at the instance of the Government you represent.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your most obedient servant,

(Sig.) HENRY E. COOPER,
Minister of Foreign Affairs

Hon. Harold M. Sewall,
U.S. Envoy Extraordinary, etc.,
Honolulu.

The Tokyo Journal strenuously contends that a payment accompanied by such declarations can not be regarded as a compensation for an injury inflicted, but is simply a douceur handed over from motives of benevolence. Japan can not accept such "charity money" without a serious loss of dignity. She contended for a principle, not for the receipt of a few paltry dollars. The Cabinet of the time took action of a most pronounced character. It sent a man-of-war to Honolulu and it created the impression that no measures would be shrunk from in order to redress the wrong done to subjects of this empire. Yet now a wretched sum of hush-money is to be received and Japan is to be told, as she pockets it, that no wrong whatever was suffered by her. What emphasizes the humiliation and places her foreign policy in a doubly grotesque light, is that her Government vehemently protested against the annexation of Hawaii by the United States when that project first came upon the tapis, and did not hesitate to proclaim that the balance of power would be disturbed in the Pacific and the tranquillity of the Orient threatened if the annexation were carried out. And now, within little more than a year of the public formulation of those grave statements, the same Japanese Government allows the annexation project to be used by the United States as a lever for inducing Hawaii to settle a just claim of Japan's. In short, Japan is made a vicarious factor in promoting annexation, since she accepts a sum of money which Hawaii pays with the avowed object of facilitating annexation, and which America required Hawaii to pay as a necessary preliminary to annexation. Out of these materials the Nichi Nichi Shimbun constructs a strong indictment. It declares that the world will deduce from this object lesson a clear estimate of the quality of Japan's foreign policy, and that the weak vacillation of her statesmen will be a subject of general ridicule. There is but one way to deal with the situation—return the money at once with an intimation that Japan can not accept any payment unless it is acknowledged to be her due, and that she declines to tacitly waive the rights for which she has contended, in consideration of a few dollars handed over to her with the reservation that they are paid as a matter of independent expediency, and not as a point of justice. The Nichi Nichi trusts that the Privy Council will not endorse this procedure.

Our readers will be prepared to hear that the above argument has provoked much discussion. The elements of sentiment that it contains are precisely calculated to appeal to the romantic side of the Japanese mind. But although, as we have said, there is some excitement, it is not by any means in proportion to the subject. The Chiuo Shimbun, indeed, continues to strike sledge-hammer blows at the Foreign Office and especially at Count Okuma, whom it satirically calls kusen no gaikokka (the peerless foreign politician), denouncing him in the same breath as wholly lacking in ability, and considerately inviting him to vacate the Foreign Office and make way for a person of competence. But the Chiuo is now a prey to the "swearing-at-large" mood. It simply rails in general terms, seldom attempting to establish its accusations by definite evidence. On the other hand, the Mainichi Shimbun is the only journal that seems to address itself to rebutting the Nichi Nichi's charges. We say "seems to address itself," for although a reader of the former journal's articles can scarcely fail to recognise that they are evoked by the latter's assaults there is no direct reference made to the Nichi Nichi, neither are its arguments about Hawaii explicitly traversed. The line taken by the Mainichi is general condemnation of persons whom it describes as "the coterie of aggressists." These individuals, it says, are the victims of a semi-insane "jingoism," which tends to check national progress and to disturb the minds of the rising generation. Now, they are for striking at Korea; anon, they advocate Japan's territorial expansion; yesterday, they agitated for enterprise in the direction of Siam, and the re-establishment of a Japanese city there; to-day, they urge the necessity of fighting Russia. They are more mischievous than thieves and pickpockets, and equally careless of the dictates of right. The Mainichi Shimbun experiences a certain embarrassment in adopting this line, because, prior to the accession of the present Cabinet, it was itself a prominent exponent of the so called "strong foreign policy," and its denunciations of the Foreign Office's invertebrate methods were conspicuously vehement. But it extricates itself from the shackles of its record by explaining that it is always in favour of a strong foreign policy whenever a question of right is at stake, and that what it objects to is reckless aggressiveness and truculence inspired chiefly in the interest of party politics without any regard to right and wrong, or to the empire's real benefit.

The Yomiuri Shimbun appears to have laid out for itself a definite route which it follows with almost monotonous persistency, its goal being to divert attention from domestic politics to foreign. Our readers are familiar with the arguments recently adduced by it, from time to time, in favour of an alliance between this country, America, and England. Nothing has been added to them of late, but we notice a decided change in the general character of the Yomiuri's policy. Hitherto its contention has been that Japan must insist on having a voice in the settlement of the Philippines question, and that her cooperation would be essential to the United States in that matter. But it now says that unless Japan throws in her lot with some of the Great Powers she will be left out in the cold, and that the time has come for her to make up her mind. There is a marked difference in the two lines of argument. We need not enter into details.

The persistent tendency of the Jiji Shimpo's writing at present is to discredit the Cabinet. The leading journal does not, indeed, devote its columns to specific attacks. Its method is rather to censure the Ministry's powerlessness for good than to arraign their sins of commission. Ten days ago, it published a remarkable article which may be said to have inaugurated this crusade of contempt. Party Cabinets, it said, are not an achievement standing to the credit of the parties themselves: they are the natural outcome of political progress. The Constitutionalists, therefore, can not pretend to have established any claim on the country's gratitude. The wave of progress has carried them into a port which would have been entered by others if not by them. What has been their record since they reached the haven? From the time when the organization of the Cabinet commenced, office-seeking seemed to become the whole business of the Constitutionalists. Naturally people who have been fasting throughout a long voyage want to eat when they come ashore. But the Constitutionalists did not land like Robinson Crusoe on an uninhabited island. They found an organized community ready to hold them responsible for their acts. Everybody knows, of course, that their pretext of overthrowing clan cabinets was only conch-blowing. They can not rely on it any more. They have now to prove their capacity. If they accomplish even a fraction of what they have promised, it will be much. But in truth little can be expected of them, for they are a heterogeneous and ill-cemented body. The encouragement given to them by the press has been prompted by the motive that induces us to speak words of solace to a sick man. Nobody ever thought much of them as administrators, and if they continue in their present path, the country will conclude that clan partizans have merely been exchanged for party partizans. The men they have put into the highest offices of the State are not worth talking about. They are inferior to the men they have replaced. In one respect the situation is greatly altered for the worse, inasmuch as the Constitutionalists are making a mere plaything of the administrative machine. There was a time when the nation had just cause to complain of the clan statesmen. But thereafter things changed greatly, and now the party politicians are much more objectionable. They had better mind their ways. Otherwise we (Jiji Shimpo) will deal them a fatal stroke. Nothing could be easier than to overthrow such a Cabinet. If we hold our hand, it is not because they have our approval, but because we pity them. But it is time that their appetite for office was appeased and that they turned to their duty. Unless they give practical recognition to that fact, they shall be prostrated by our pen.

In the sequel of the above somewhat bombastic menaces, came three other articles that can not have afforded very pleasant reading to the Constitutionalists. The first attacked them on the subject of the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. They seem to think, said the Jiji, that the only question at issue in allotting the portfolio was to preserve the good relations between their own factions. Anybody will do for the post in their opinion provided that he is personally acceptable to this coterie of politicians or to that. They forget that they are dealing with the foreign policy of the empire of Japan, not with a mere party plaything. The Minister of Foreign Affairs in Japan must not merely be a man of wide experience and proved capacity, but must also possess prestige abroad and influence at home. Count Mutsu was an excellent Minister. Marquis Ito or Count Inouye could fill the post well. But, for the rest, public opinion points unmistakably to Count Okuma. If, however, Count Okuma can not continue to serve, then let him nominate his successor—Baron Hayashi, or Mr. Kato, or any one whom he judges suitable.

Then, in the two other articles, the Jiji reverts to its minatory tone. Under the heading of "advice to the Constitutionalists," it says that they pretend to have toiled in the interests of the country during twenty years, but they are now shown to have been toiling all the time in their own interests. The people have been deceived by them, and the people will resent the deception unless measures are speedily taken to remove its unsightliness. "Settle domestic affairs at once and turn your attention elsewhere." The last Cabinet left plenty to be done in the field of foreign affairs. It left large problems to be solved in connection with Korea, with China, and with the Philippines. But the party politicians seem to have no conception of their duties as administrators of the empire's affairs. There is, in truth, little to be done at home. Reduce the number of officials and increase the taxes—that is the whole programme; short and simple. If there is any more idle dallying, the country will turn irrevocably against the Kensei to.

The Yorozu Choho laments that the reign of morality is disappearing in Japan and the sway of money is taking its place. The good men are stepping down from the political stage in disgust, and the bad are coming to the front. Pelf is omnipotent. There is no objection to the use of money by statesmen, but that they should be used by it is miserable. The political world at present is simply a big gambling saloon.

"EVELYN INNES."

Evelyn Innes, by George Moore,—London: T. Fisher Unwin's Colonial Library.

In "Evelyn Innes" Mr. George Moore has given us a striking and powerful example of the modern analysis-novel. Whatever may be said of the merits of this class of literature as a whole—certainly most of the specimens which afflict the public are deadly dull and not particularly edifying—it must be admitted that Mr. Moore's study of the chief character in "Evelyn Innes" is at once convincing and interesting. The literary treatment, too, is excellent, and the book is altogether the best which the author has hitherto produced.

Evelyn Innes is introduced to the reader in her father's dull suburban home in Dulwich. She is the daughter of a Catholic musician dreamily wrapped up in the pursuit of mediæval music, and with the self-appointed mission of introducing into the services of his church the ancient melodies he considers so superior to modern ideas of harmony. Evelyn inherits her father's artistic temperament, the voice of her mother, a famous operatic singer, and a fuller and more vivid nature than either of them. The girl—a woman in her appetite for life and her yearnings for a wider and more interesting career than that which lies apparently before her as a suburban music teacher—submissively accommodates herself to the musical faddism of her father; and between the two a real affection, partly natural and partly from artistic sympathies, exists. At this stage there enters into the calm current of the girl's life a new personality destined to determine her future. Sir Owen Asher meets her by chance at her father's house, and makes his taste for music an excuse for improving the acquaintance. He is an aristocrat with ideas, the chief of which is that he shall extract as much pleasure from life as he possibly can. Frank Hedonism, in fact, is his creed. At the same time honourable according to his own code, a gentleman in feeling and conduct, and with more brains than generally fall to the lot of £20,000 a year, he is an interesting type; and, despite his forty years, he makes a deep impression on the girl's imagination. She, on her part—fresh, pretty, and with a mind in which the Baronet finds an ever-new source of interest—arouses an insatiable desire for possession in the blasé, consistently selfish seeker of pleasure and the hero of a score of intrigues. Events march to their logical conclusion. The Baronet proposes that Evelyn shall go with him to Paris—to develop her voice and seek her future as a great singer. She, fully understanding that this means that she is to live with Asher as his mistress, follows her inclinations after the show of a struggle proffered as an excuse to her conscience. Asher sets her up in an establishment on the Champs Elysées, a visit to a great operatic trainer places her future as a prima donna beyond a doubt, and a year or two after Evelyn Innes, after starring the Continental towns, has taken London by storm.

Asher's early infatuation for her has by this time ripened into a constant affection, and he wishes to marry her. But he is approaching middle age; the barren agnosticism of his ideas, which in the early days of their connection the young girl absorbed in order to stifle the sting of conscience, now chills her imagination, and her mind goes back to the doctrines of her Catholic childhood; she meets a fantastic youth, one Ulick Deane, who strikes her fancy, and with whom she falls in love; and in fact, she feels, altogether, that she cannot marry the Baronet. At this time a chance visit to a convent familiar to her early days brings back with stronger force the religious influence; she realises that a life of pleasure alone cannot satisfy her; her intrigue with Deane shows her the danger of her life, unregulated by high principle, becoming a succession of liaisons,—a future from which her more serious side shrinks. She is, too, weary of the stage; bored by her very success; impressed by the futility of life; and the added miseries of insomnia tend to awaken in her the yearning for a return to the old faith and a pure life. She decides to go once more to confession. There she falls under the influence of a Monsignior whose narrow, clear, decisive character, undisturbed by a single doubt, and inexorable in the logic of his creed conquers her. In his hands she is as wax; at his advice she goes into a convent for a few weeks' rest; and there, under the influence of the simple surroundings and the quiet, sexless lives of the nuns, her career ends for the present in peace. But Mr. Moore promises a sequel, and we shall be interested to see whether the barenness of a convent life will long satisfy his heroine. These last scenes—with the little touches showing the difficulties of a prima donna, used to an endless wardrobe and an elaborate dressing case, accommodating herself to the cramped conditions of a nun—are admirably described. The Reverend Mother and other inmates are charming portraits, and their characters and simple life form an effective background for the introduction of the great singer turned penitent.

In other parts the novel would be greatly improved by a process of intelligent sub-editing. The long descriptions and conversations about music, full of irritating technicalities, are insufferably tedious to any but a musician. Asher, too, stops the progress of the story for a score of pages with an essay on Balzac which would make a good-sized magazine article; and Ulick Deane, who talks in fantastic language for hours together on things that never were on land or sea, is a bore of the first water. With these exceptions the novel is an excellent one, and its literary merits are of the highest order.

Another of Kobe's oldest residents has passed away, says the Hiogo News, in the person of Mr. M. Voisey, who has been resident in Kobe since the opening of the port, just thirty years ago. Mr. Voisey was formerly connected with the firm of Messrs. G. H. Whymark & Co., provision merchants, but disposed of his interest in the business many years ago. During his residence here Mr. Voisey acquired a considerable amount of property, but a sad affliction of the eyes rendered him unable to enjoy to the full that amount of comfort in his rest and retirement which would otherwise have been the reward of his enterprise and energy while in the heyday of his life.

THE HAWAIIAN AFFAIR.

We can not but think that the criticisms published by some of our vernacular contemporaries with regard to the Hawaiian affair are far-fetched and inconsiderate. It will scarcely be denied that the Hawaiian Government have shown a remarkable and lamentable want of tact. President Dole's statement that the settlement was "purely a matter of compromise at the request of the United States and made in order that the United States might not inherit the dispute;" Mr. Hatch's assertion that "there had been informal assurance (at the State Department in Washington) that it was believed Hawaii was right as to the legal side of the question;" the sentence in Mr. Cooper's letter to the United States Representative in Honolulu that "the payment was made solely at the instance of the United States Government;" and, finally, Mr. Hatch's allegation that "it was apparent there were important reasons of State behind the request of the United States"—all these things were in the worst possible taste, and can only be described as tactless blunders. If the Honolulu Cabinet believed that it was making a concession, it should have been careful not to destroy the effect of its act by robbing it of all grace. However, what we wish to point out is that the above utterances have no concern for Japan. Her business is with the official written declaration made to her by the Hawaiian Government in connexion with the handing over of the money. The words of that document—we translate from the Nippon—are:—"There being no time to have recourse to the services of a mediator prior to the incorporation of Hawaii into the Republic of the United States, the Government of the latter has addressed to the Empire of Japan and to the Hawaiian Republic a friendly suggestion that the two countries should come to an amicable understanding without further inquiry into the rights and wrongs of the matter under dispute, &c." An arrangement concluded on that basis need not be at all hurtful to Japan's self-respect, nor has she any occasion to distress herself about diplomatic solecisms perpetrated by the statesmen of Honolulu in their own Council Chamber or in their despatches to the United States Representative. Besides, whatever may be said by President Dole, Mr. Cooper, or Mr. Hatch, the world knows perfectly well that the United States Government would never have urged upon Hawaii the advisability of making a monetary payment to Japan unless they had been fully assured of the justice of Japan's claim, nor would Hawaii have acceded to the suggestion had she not known that her case would not bear legal scrutiny. The victory is with Japan, and she may congratulate herself on it. She has come out of this affair with flying colours, for not only has she carried her point about compensation, but she has contrived that the field of Hawaiian enterprise shall remain open to her subjects on better terms than ever. In consideration of the latter achievement, she could well have afforded to waive the whole of her claim for compensation, even though it had been ten or twenty times as large.

Another point urged by the critics is that Japan has "lost face" by making a large abatement of her original demand, and that the money she receives is not nearly sufficient to meet the losses incurred. At to the former objection, the truth is that Japan never indicated any definite sum to the Hawaiian Government. Her reticence was not, indeed, a matter of deliberate policy, but it has certainly proved convenient. As to the second criticism, it does not appear to us that the sum paid by Hawaii is so much under the mark. Here, for example, is a simple calculation:—

		Yen.
Passage of 1200 men to and from Hawaii, at 15 yen for the outward voyage and 8 yen for the return voyage (the sums actually charged, we believe)		27,600
Compensation for enforced idleness (60 days at 50 sen per man)		36,000
Payment of 10 yen per emigrant made to the Emigration Companies		12,000
Claims made by the owners of—
Shinshiu Maru	35,000
Kinai Maru	12,000
Sakura Maru	10,000	57,000

We do not see that any other claims present themselves, unless some twelve thousand yen be allowed on account of expenses incurred by the emigrants in travelling to and from their homes to the places of embarkation, and four or five yen per head for hotel outlays while awaiting the sailing of the steamer. We strongly suspect that the folks who declare 150,000 yen to be so very much below the mark have never made any serious attempt to calculate what the actual outlays were. Of course, the expenses of sending a man-of-war to Honolulu and some other costs defrayed by the Japanese Government might be included, but the omission of those items constitutes the compromise, as we understand.

The arrangement effected with Hawaii continues to receive the severest criticism from the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, and Mr. Hoshi Toru, not being at all the kind of man to take a beating lying down, has replied very stoutly to his critics, with the natural result of provoking them to bitter rejoinder. Speaking at a welcome banquet given in his honour on the 22nd instant, Mr. Hoshi—evidently referring to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun—expressed surprise that a journal possessing public confidence should be betrayed into sweeping declarations about a subject which it had not taken the trouble to investigate fully. The points made by him were virtually those noted in our own columns on the 22nd instant; namely, that Japan could not be charged with having abated her monetary demand, inasmuch as she had never named any definite sum from the beginning to the end of negotiations; that the amount actually paid by Hawaii was by no means insufficient; and that, whatever the members of the Hawaiian Government may have said to each other or to the United States, they never spoke or wrote to the Japanese Government a word that could be construed as an intimation that the payment made by them was simply a matter of graciousness. They called it a compromise, and that is what it was, let the critics say what they pleased. Of course the Nichi Nichi makes a vehement reply, and asks contemptuously whether the Government agreeing to such a settlement is really composed of the self-called "strong-foreign-policy" statesmen about whom the world used to hear so much.

The question which the critics of the Hawaiian settlement appear to consider most unanswerable is:—"Granted that the arrangement was a compromise, does not a compromise mean that both sides makes some concession? What concession, pray, has Hawaii made"? A strange question surely. It would be more appropriate to ask, what concession has Japan made? Japan asked for a payment by way of compensation for Hawaii's arbitrary rejection of certain Japanese emigrants, and Hawaii has made a payment. We don't quite see what Japan has conceded, unless, indeed, she took a little less than some folks think she was entitled to. But, inasmuch as she never formulated any fixed sum, she is not in the position of having abated a sen of her demand. Hawaii's concession is that she paid up—a pretty solid concession, seeing that she was not asked to do anything more. She may pretend that she did it solely for the sake of America's pretty eyes, but, before she gets the world to believe that, human nature will have to undergo a radical change.

THE JUDICIARY.

The chief of the Confidential Secretariat in the Ministry of Justice has addressed to the Japan Times a letter protesting against an extraordinary story, credited and commented on by the Kobe Chronicle, to the effect that the present Minister of Justice thinks there may be as many as a thousand judicial officials disabled by age from continuing in the service, but that since to dismiss such a large number at once might interfere with the administration of justice, he proposes to remove only 500 at present and appoint barristers in their stead. The Chief Secretary says:—

> It is on this basis of gross misrepresentation that the Chronicle proceeds to criticise the Minister of Justice in a very flippant and contemptuous tone. The whole of the above-quoted statement is absolutely without foundation. The judicial officials in Japan are generally competent men and those to whom they owe their appointments are equally competent.
> We did not think any man of intelligence would assume that there is such a large proportion of incompetent judges amongst the existing eighteen hundred or so judicial officials, including public procurators, as one thousand persons, of whom the Minister "proposes," as the Chronicle says, "to dismiss only five hundred at present."

It would be indeed inexplicable that any "man of intelligence" should believe such wild stories, but if the chief of the Confidential Secretariat were familiar with the habits of the anti-Japanese section of the local foreign press, he would know that "intelligence" is not brought to bear upon rumours injurious to the reputation of this country. Were there question of a statement calculated to create a good impression—were it asserted, for example, that the records of a thousand Japanese Judicial officials showed them to be men educated according to modern standards of jurisprudence—then indeed the most searching scrutiny would be exercised, and credence would be withheld until the last moment. But if the tale is mischievous, if it represents the Japanese or any of their institutions in a bad light, then it is eagerly and unhesitatingly swallowed. When we speak of an "anti-Japanese section" of the local foreign press, we ought to add that the section now consists of the Kobe Chronicle alone. All its contemporaries have laid aside their old bias and are to-day moderate and fair in tone. The Kobe Chronicle has an honorable monopoly.

OPERATION OF THE REVISED TREATIES.

Extraordinarily confused assertions and perplexed conjectures have been published from time to time about the operation of the new Tariff, and it now appears probable that the public will have a similar experience with regard to the operation of the Revised Treaties. Probably our readers have some curiosity about the facts of the case, and we shall, therefore, state them simply.

The main source of doubt is evidently the Austro-Hungarian Treaty. Some people appear to think that it has not even been signed, and others are of opinion that the Austro-Hungarian Government, in view of the serious domestic perplexities with which it has to deal, can not be confidently expected to adopt any decided measure with regard to the Treaty. As a matter of fact the Treaty was not only concluded and signed more than a year ago, but it has also been ratified by the Hungarian Reichstag. Its ratification by the Austrian Reichsrath alone remains to be accomplished, and, should that consummation seem likely to be much longer deferred, the Government in Vienna has pledged itself to find a way out of the deadlock, merely stipulating that the new Tariff shall not go into force until January 1st, so that Austro-Hungarian subjects may have a reasonable interval after the promulgation of the Treaty. Concerning the alternative which the Austrian Cabinet will adopt in the event of the Reichsrath's timely action becoming hopeless, we can not, of course, speak with confidence, but evidently a very simple plan would be for the Emperor to declare the operation of the present Treaty suspended after a certain date. His Majesty has power to take that step, inasmuch as the Treaty was ratified independently of either Reichstag or Reichsrath. At all events, the Government in Vienna, a few days ago, formally announced its agreement to the operation of the Treaties from July next, so there is an end of the matter.

The next point of perplexity is the French Treaty. Owing to an oversight for which the Japanese negotiator in Paris is said to have been responsible, the French Treaty can not go into operation before August 4th, 1899, whereas all the other Treaties are to become operative on July 17th. There is thus a difference of 18 days. The interval is insignificant. But it might possibly give rise to inconvenient consequences, for reasons that will be patent to any one who considers the effect of the most-favoured-nation clause. The late French Cabinet regarded the matter as a bagatelle, and the Japanese Government has never been disposed to attach much importance to it. We may conclude, therefore, that some arrangement will be effected without difficulty. It will probably occur to our readers that the easiest plan would be to postpone the operation of all the Treaties until August 4th. That is certainly what the Japanese Government would do did it not happen that three of the Treaties—those with the United States, Portugal, and Peru—have the date of their operation textually fixed, independently of any preliminary notice or other condition. In the case of the British, German, Italian, etc., Treaties, the earliest date—July 17th—is alone indicated, and there would consequently be no difficulty in postponing their operation so as to make it synchronise with that of the French Treaty. But the three Treaties above alluded to stand in the way of that solution. It is a small matter at any rate, and no difficulty need be experienced in effecting an adjustment.

TIMID REFORMERS.

The history of reform shows one identical feature wherever the scene is laid: each new step is greeted with trembling and apprehension by a conservative section of the population, and never once are the doubters justified. Of no country is that truer than of England. When we recall the prophecies of disaster that every progressive measure evoked in Great Britain, and their unfailing contradiction by the course of events, we do not know which is the more surprising—that reformers could venture to defy such vaticinations, or that Cassandras were invariably found to iterate them. The Japanese, on the whole, have been remarkably courageous. They have taken innumerable leaps in the dark with very little show of trepidation, and hitherto they have always lit on their feet. Of course they have had the great encouragement derivable from the successful example of others. None of their departures has been absolutely novel: all were imitations. Still no small endowment of pluck was needed to hold them steadily on their route, and if it fell to our task to write the story of their Meiji radicalism, we should credit them with boldness as a conspicuous attribute. The Mainichi Shimbun does not take that view, however. It writes as though all innovations and progressive steps in Japan were accompanied by loud forecasts of evil, and in proof of its assertions it refers to the opening of the country, the abolition of torture, the inauguration of constitutional Government, and the granting of free speech. Does our contemporary really think that those sweeping changes, accomplished as they were with extraordinary rapidity, can be said to have encountered much opposition or inspired much alarm? Our notion is very different. As to the recent wholesale abolition of regulations and admonitions imposing restrictions upon the intrusion of teachers and students into the field of politics—which abolition forms the text of our contemporary's article—it appears to us that the Mainichi begs the question when it assumes that the Educational Department's act must be classed as a reform. In principle, Mr. Ozaki will have thinking men on his side. The control of lads in colleges and schools ought to be left to the faculties of those institutions instead of being undertaken by a Department of the Administration. But the question is, are the teachers, directors, and presidents of Japanese scholastic institutions competent to exercise efficient control? They certainly have not shown that they are. We have not the slightest doubt that plenty of thoroughly competent men could be found, but the educational profession can not be expected to attract them so long as the present scale of pitifully meagre emoluments is continued.

MARQUIS ITO.

Marquis Ito talked very frankly to one person or another on the eve of his departure from Kobe. It is natural that as he leaves his country under the peculiar circumstances of the time—"turns his back on Japan," some people say—he should recall the beginnings of his brilliant career and let his memory rest again on the comrades with whom he worked at the moulding of modern Japan. Few indeed of that band of statesmen and soldiers survive today. If Marquis Ito lives until next year, though he will still be a young man from the point of view of English politicians, he will have attained a greater age than any of the Restoration leaders reached. Of course the colossal figure of the elder Saigo stands out prominently in such a retrospect. Saigo, says the Marquis, never had any idea of disloyalty to the Emperor. He raised his standard solely against the politicians with whom he could not agree. The time in which he lived, not his own wish or judgment, put arms into his hands. Were he alive now, and had he to deal with such a situation as that which recently confronted Marquis Ito, he would have confined himself to legitimate and peaceful expedients instead of making a miserable and fruitless end.

Marquis Ito did not invoke the shade of Saigo for any idle purpose. It is evident that he intended to summon the well remembered hero as a witness against hot-headed folks who imagine that the aid of force may still be employed to stem the current of unwelcome political changes. So far as fighting is concerned, Marquis Ito was prepared to fight, but with constitutional weapons. Now for the first time we have from his own lips the story of what happened last June. When he dissolved the House of Representatives, his intention, he says, was to form a great political party in opposition to the Progressists. But he found himself the sole advocate of that programme among the elder statesmen. They would not join him. He gave up the idea in disgust and resolved to take a trip to China.

As for China, the Marquis takes little stock in the reforms lately inaugurated by her. He compares them to clouds in a time of drought from which no rain descends—clouds in another part of the firmament. He intends to be useful if he possibly can, and he says that if he discovers any reasonable prospect of doing good, he will not stop at trifles (zuibun omoikitta koto wo yarō).

The Marquis made an interesting reference to the late Baron Inouye Ki, Minister of Education, and to Baron Suyematsu Kencho, his own son-in-law, recently Minister of Communications. These two distinguished men both owed their emergence from obscurity to the discernment of the Marquis. Many years ago, he said, an official report reached him over the signature of Mr. Kishida, a Judge of the Supreme Court. When the Marquis (not then a Marquis but plain Mr. Ito) read it, he was at once struck by the style, which he knew to be far above Judge Kishida's literary strength. He made inquiries about the writer, found him to be a humble clerk, Inouye Ki, and immediately secured the services of the youth who afterwards distinguished himself so highly, and died when his career of greatness had just become assured. Baron Suyematsu's case was somewhat similar. He was an obscure lad in the office of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun when one or two paragraphs written by him attracted Mr. Ito's attention. Curious to see the writer, Marquis Ito sent for him, and found a new protegé on whose account he may fairly claim to have placed the country under a debt of gratitude.

FIELD MARSHAL'S DECORATION.

It has hitherto been the custom to translate the Japanese term taishō as "field-marshal." Thus when Counts Yamagata and Oyama—now Marquises—commanded the Korean and Liaotung Corps d'armée, they were usually spoken of as Field Marshal Yamagata and Field Marshal Oyama. The nomenclature was inconvenient, because, taking the ranks in their regular order of sequence, a taishō in the Army was simply a full general, and in the Navy, an Admiral of the Fleet. Since these days the difficulty has been solved by the creation of another rank, gensui, which may be considered as the true equivalent of "Field Marshal." The Emperor is the Dai-gensui, or "Field Marshal Commanding in Chief," and Marquis Yamagata, Marquis Oyama, &c., are Gensui, or Field Marshals.

We are reminded of the subject by a specimen of the decoration to be worn by the Gensui. It is a very beautiful specimen of work in translucid enamels, the manipulation of which for purposes of artistic decoration has been carried to a point of very high proficiency by the modern Japanese craftsman. The design is composed of crossed flags disposed so as to form an oval, and grasping at the upper ends of the staves a sixteen-petalled chrysanthemum. Beneath the chrysanthemum is a band of paulowina blossoms in purple enamel, surmounting a triplet of paulowina leaves in green. The suns and rays on the flags are red, the petals of the chrysanthemums are yellow, and the field is silver hammered in fish-roe diaper. Mr. Asada Sashichi, the maker of this beautiful bit of work, will gain much credit by it.

THE ARMY AND THE NAVY.

It would appear that the Cabinet has decided not merely to make no changes in the sense of equalizing the yearly expenditures on account of military and naval expansion, but also that the two services are to have considerably increased appropriations. We have no information of our own on the subject, but we find the statement in the Shogyo Shimpo, which seldom makes errors of fact. Count Inouye, as our readers remember, while not altering the expansion programme as a whole, proposed to cut down the very marked discrepancies in the outlays for the various years, so that while the programme would be completed at the originally fixed time, the strain on the finances of the State would be more equally distributed over the whole period. But even that apparently judicious modification is not favoured by the present Cabinet. The Shogyo, in somewhat vague terms, implies that the Emperor has made his wishes felt in this matter, and, at the same time hints that the Cabinet would do well to avail itself more liberally of the Sovereign's enlightened directions.

STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

This question is assuming a very interesting aspect. Certain publicists insist that it has been brought upon the tapis solely for the purpose of creating a split in the Cabinet. They allege that a little band of conspirators, nicknamed the "Twelve Society of Azabu," whose chief is Viscount Takashima, with Mr. Oi Kentaro—the celebrated Mr. Oi Kentaro—for his lieutenant, are busily devising means to bring about a rupture between the Liberals and the Progressists. The Yamada affair was largely of their contrivance, and it was principally at the instance of Mr. Oi that the Tokyo Section of the Constitutional Party recently called upon Mr. Yamada to resign. Another and a more serious scheme is this railway question. It is well known that Count Itagaki favours the State ownership of railways and that Count Okuma opposes it. In other words, the Liberals advocate it and the Progressists denounce it. If then it can be forced into the field of discussion, the two parties must break away from each other. The political opponents of the Cabinet look at the problem from that point of view. On the other hand, it is whispered that the Liberals themselves, regarding their secession from the Constitutional Party as a mere question of time, are anxious to secure the allegiance of the "Business Men" by openly associating themselves with the State purchase problem, while the Progressists also, anticipating the same result, are disposed to coquet with the question in order to retain the support of the "Business Men." Finally, there are the speculators in shares, who see their way to a big job if the Government can be committed to the problem, and there are the brokers who would pick up some fat crumbs from the feast. All these forces are combined to push the project.

As to Counts Okuma and Itagaki, the interviewer has naturally been busy with them. Count Itagaki expresses himself in the plainest terms. The backbone of his contention is military strategy. He does not believe that a State can be certain of fully utilizing its means of communication unless it has complete and entire control of the main lines of railway, and he thinks that the present is the time for the Government to get possession of the roads before railway syndicates and railway kings come into existence, and before the problem is complicated by "mixed residence," for Count Itagaki is persuaded that no precautions could secure the State against risks of inconvenience if, in time of war, when patriotic sentiment was keenly roused, foreign shareholders had a controlling voice in the affairs of an important railway. He further holds that it is among the chief duties of a Government to provide the best and cheapest facilities of communication for the people, and that railways should therefore be under State direction, just as posts and telegraphs are. Finally he thinks that only by using the Government's credit can foreign capital be procured cheaply, and that the best and simplest form of security Japan can offer to foreign capitalists is her railways. The country is in urgent need of cheap capital and the shares of the railways now rule very low in the market. From every point of view the time is excellently suited to the project. Count Itagaki has not brought up the matter for discussion since he became a member of the Cabinet, but he says that Mr. Hayashi, the Minister of Communications, has been conducting preliminary investigations, and he adds that Count Okuma, although originally unfavorable to the scheme, is not likely to let the present unique opportunity escape—a somewhat inconsequential statement.

The above interview with Count Itagaki is taken from the columns of the Jiji Shimpo, which journal is radically opposed to the idea of State purchase. The Jiji has interviewed Count Okuma also, but failed to obtain from him an equally explicit statement of views. What the Count said, in effect, was that the Government had too many pressing problems on hand to pay any attention to such a matter as the State purchase of railways. There were the problem of administrative reform, the problem of finance, the duty of preparing bills for submission to the Diet, the business of getting ready for the operation of the Revised Treaties, and so on. Great difficulty was experienced in making satisfactory arrangements for the conduct of the ordinary business of communications; the posts, the telegraphs, and the telephones, as every one knew, stood in urgent need of reform, and it was quite out of the question to give immediate attention to a project like the State purchase of railways. "As for me," the Count said in conclusion, "I have always been in favour of the private ownership of railways. At all events, the question is not before the Cabinet now. If we disposed of the pressing business that now occupies our attention, we might have to consider the railway problem, but speculators in shares are chiefly concerned about it now. You can easily guess whence its renewed discussion emanated."

To round off the subject, we may mention that an anonymous official, supposed be an authority, has informed the Yomiuri Shimbun that, whereas the price which the Government is advised to pay for the four railways in question—namely, the Nippon, the Sanyo, the Kiushiu, and the Kobu—is 200 million yen, which, at 5 per cent., involves an annual payment of 10 million yen in the form of interest, the net earnings of the four lines do not exceed 4 million yen, so that there would be a loss of 6 million yen to the State. But how the estimate of 200 million yen is arrived at we are quite unable to understand. Supposing that the lines were purchased at 50,000 yen a mile—which is certainly more than they are worth—200 million yen would represent the cost of 4,000 miles of road, which is a third more than the total mileage of all the lines in Japan, public and private included.

"THE CONDITION OF FOREIGNERS UNDER THE NEW TREATIES."

The International Committee of Yokohama has taken a step which can not fail to prove of the greatest service to foreigners. It has caused a brochure to be compiled for the purpose of affording to foreigners full information concerning the laws of Japan in so far as the latter bear upon the conduct of their business or on their everyday life, with explanations of the points in which Japanese law differs from English. This statement of the contents of the brochure sounds formidable, but in truth the whole story is told clearly and briefly within the short compass of 53 pages. The author of the work is Dr. L. Lönholm, Professor of German Law in the Imperial University of Japan. He deserves to be highly congratulated on the perspicacity and thoroughness of his explanations, as well as on their complete freedom from technicalities calculated to perplex the lay mind.

The first feeling inspired by a perusal of the book will, we venture to predict, be one of satisfaction. The foreigner, naturally apprehensive about changes which he does not comprehend, will learn that there is absolutely no cause for uneasiness, and that, so far as the written law is concerned, his status under the Revised Treaties will be in almost every respect satisfactory. We shall not attempt, of course, to follow Dr. Lönholm in detail, but a few references will be useful in order to enable our readers to understand what a boon this brochure confers on the community by lifting it from the fog-land of doubt and uncertainty into the clear atmosphere of knowledge and assurance. The author sets out by discussing the question of land tenure. Our readers must be already pretty weary of the subject, and we need not go further than to say that Dr. Lönholm again describes explicitly the two forms of lease under which foreigners will be able to acquire land, namely, the long building lease, or chijō ken, as to the period of which the law leaves the parties entirely free; and the ordinary lease, chintaishaku, whose duration is limited to 20 years. We observe that Dr. Lönholm now seems to regret the use of the term "superficies" as a translation for chijō-ken, because the Japanese right is not exactly the same as the Roman right to which "superficies" originally applied. In our opinion it is regrettable chiefly for another reason, namely, that since there is nothing in English law corresponding exactly to chijō-ken, many Englishmen in Japan, with that fine old spirit of conservatism that has so happily blocked the path of reform from time to time in the "tight little island," regard this chijō ken as a new-fangled, nondescript kind of animal which, not being already familiar, must necessarily be incomprehensible, and which, on the whole, they would prefer not to understand. If the story of the discussion that has taken place in the local English press about this marvel, "superficies" were dispassionately set down, it would certainly be a splendid monument of human intelligence. Told in a sentence the case is this:—"Because Japanese legislators, while fixing the maximum term for an ordinary lease at 20 years, and that for an emphyteutical lease at 50 years, did not fix any limit in the case of the building lease, but left the lessor and the lessee absolutely free to make their own arrangements as to period, therefore the building lease must be regarded as an apocryphal, deceptive kind of affair, having no practical interest for the sturdy Briton." In short, these extremely sensible journalists laid down the principle that a privilege to be genuine must be restricted, and that untrammelled liberty is not liberty at all. They remind us of the Japanese student who, when a tender beefsteak was served to him at a restaurant, bade the waiter to take the thing away, for he didn't recognise a beefsteak as genuine unless his teeth got some real exercise in eating it. There is, however, a special point to be noted here, a point of considerable importance which, though of course known to all students of the new Civil Code, is now for the first time set forth publicly for the information of foreigners. It is that any commercial company or partnership, created in Japan under the Japanese law and duly registered, has the right to own land, even though all its members are foreigners. This rule does not apply, however, to a partnership or company organized in a foreign country under foreign law, although it has established a branch office in Japan. For example:—If A and B are carrying on business in Japan, it will be possible for them, after July 17th, 1889, to register themselves under Japanese law as the firm of A and B, and, thus becoming a juridical person, they may purchase and own as much land as they please in the name of their firm. This interesting point is fully explained by Dr. Lönholm.

It need scarcely be said that the foreigner's right to carry on business in Japan occupies a good deal of Dr. Lönholm's attention. The treaties confer on him the right of engaging in all operations of lawful commerce, but say nothing about professions, such as law, medicine, teaching, journalism, and so forth. As to the profession of barrister, there is a regulation restricting its pursuit to Japanese subjects, but of course a due arrangement will be made to meet that case; and with regard to medicine, teaching, and drug-selling, the situation is very simple. But journalism calls for brief comment. It was assumed at first by several foreign critics, ourselves among the number, that without some special enabling legislation on the part of the Japanese Government foreigners would not be competent to publish newspapers in Japan after the Revised Treaties went into operation. Subsequently, when the French Treaty appeared and was found to confer on foreigners the right of carrying on a métier, it was inferred that the difficulty had been met, since journalism is a métier. Dr. Lönholm, however, does not take the latter view. He defines métier as a "handicraft or mechanical occupation," and declares it "doubtful whether the work of an editor can be classed as a trade or métier at all." Of course that view is strictly accurate. Métier, according to Littré, is the exercise d'un art méchanique. Consequently the French Treaty does not cover journalism, and Dr. Lönholm says that "the Government has now under consideration a change of the law so as to permit foreigners to engage in journalism." But Dr. Lönholm omits to note a fact which disposes completely of this question. In the new Commercial Code, which has already passed the House of Peers, and which will certainly be in operation soon, we find (Book III. Chap. I., Arts 263 and 264) an exact list of the various operations constituting "acts of commerce," and among them are specified "acts relating to the operations of editors, printers, and photographers," when such acts enter into the exercise of a profession. That is a very marked departure from the theory hitherto maintained in Japan, namely, that the editing and publishing of newspapers are acts having a quasi public character and ought to be subject to special regulations in the interests of good order and morality. However, the fact alone concerns us here, and the fact is that when the new Commercial Code goes into operation, journalism will be an act of lawful commerce, and as such will be covered by the Treaties.

The books which firms will be obliged to keep is a subject that has inspired some anxiety, but Dr. Lönholm explains that "books may be kept in any language," and that "such books as are now usually kept by foreign merchants are quite sufficient to comply with the requirements of law." We shall not attempt to follow Dr. Lönholm's exposition of the taxes to which foreigners will be liable, of public and criminal procedure, of domiciliary visits and so forth, especially as these subjects have already been treated from time to time in our own columns. But we venture to recommend every foreign resident to provide himself with a copy of this excellent book, unless, indeed, he prefers a state of ignorance, and is unwilling to lose the opportunities for grumbling that it affords.

JAPANESE TRAVELLERS TO AMERICA.

The Chief of the Metropolitan Police issues a notification with reference to the choice of a route by persons crossing to America viâ Canada. He says that if they travel by the Canadian Pacific steamers they will have no difficulty in gaining admittance to the States, since a special arrangement exists empowering the local authorities at Vancouver or Victoria to grant passes, after due examination, to persons arriving by the Canadian Pacific Company's vessels. No such arrangement exists, however, with regard to the Northern Pacific Company or the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, and persons travelling in their steamers with the intention of proceeding to the States are liable to disappointment. Such a notification will not conduce to the interests of the Northern Pacific or the Japanese Company.

RAILWAYS IN KOREA.

A telegram from Söul, dated 2.30 p.m. on the 17th instant, says that the German Consul recently applied, on behalf of a German firm in Chemulpo, for a charter to build a line of railway between Söul and Yensan (on the north-eastern coast), but the Korean Government replied, on the 15th instant, in the sense that as it was about to organise a railway bureau and undertake the building of its own lines, it had resolved not to grant any charters to foreigners with the exception of those already promised. That is disappointing. The chance of Korea's doing the work herself is very remote, we imagine, and in the meanwhile she has apparently arrived at the very short-sighted resolve not to let any one else do it for her.

A MAGAZINE SUSPENDED.

It has fallen to the unhappy lot of the Home Department under Count Itagaki's direction to have to suspend another magazine, the Futsu-kyoiku. This periodical, as its name implies, is an educational publication. It therefore pays no security, and has not the legal right of inserting political matter. Despite that fact, it inserted in its last number the speech delivered by Professor Toyama on the 3rd instant at the meeting of the Meikeikai. We alluded to the speech at some length in a previous issue, and of course there can not be any doubt as to its political character. Moreover it contained the works kokon tozai mizoyu no daiseijika daikyoikuka-taru Okuma-haku (Count Okuma, the great statesman, the great educationalist, whose like was never seen of old or of late, in the Orient or in the Occident)—words obviously used in a satirical sense—and in permitting the speech to be printed, Professor Toyama prepared it thus:—"My object in putting this lecture into type is to present it, with all due respect, to Count Okuma, for whom I have so much respect." The editor of the magazine adds at the end of the lecture a note showing that he fully understood the responsibility he incurred in publishing it. Doubtless we shall hear a good deal about the matter, for certainly fate is very unkind when she condemns the first party Cabinet to be responsible for the suspension of two periodicals before it has been two months in office. But the fact is that the law is quite behind the time. It is altogether a grandmotherly precaution to forbid the publication of political matter by educational journals or periodicals, and for our own part we think that the officials of the Home Dpartment might very well allow the law to remain a dead letter.

COUNT OKUMA & THE LAND TAX.

Count Okuma has been telling a representative of the Jiji Shimpo that although he opposes the project of making any addition to the tax on arable lands, he is strongly in favour of exacting a larger contribution from the owners of urban lands. He bases his view on the familiar principle of the unearned increment. The market value of building lands is several hundred times greater to-day than it was twenty-five years ago, and the increment is due not to the enterprise and industry of the holders of the land, but to the operation of factors by which the public have a right to benefit. That is unquestionably true, but we do not see why the same reasoning should not apply, though with reduced force, to the case of rural lands also. The price of farm produce is certainly three times as much now as it was when the land was assessed for purposes of taxation, and the market value of the land must have risen in proportion. That increment, also, is not the result of the land-owners' efforts. It is due to a general change in the nation's condition, and the nation at large should have some of the profit. It is evidently a question of degree with Count Okuma. He would not deny the applicability of the principle of the unearned increment to both cases, but he thinks that the urban folks are much better off than the rural and should, consequently, be more heavily taxed.

THE KOBE MEMORIAL.

The Memorial addressed by the foreign community of Kobe to Lord Salisbury on the subject of the Revised Treaties, has now been published, in part at any rate. It contains, among other statements, the following:—

> By the new Codes which are shortly to come into operation the period for which land may be leased is limited to twenty years, and it is absurd to suppose that British subjects will attempt to build workshops for carrying on a manufacturing business on land which at the expiration of that time may pass out of their hands or be subject to such an increase of rent that business would be rendered impossible.

We have often had occasion to note the extraordinary fatality that seems to pursue the foreign residents in Japan whenever they combine to make representations on the subject of Treaty Revision. They appear to be doomed to commit mistakes which have the effect of fatally discrediting their action. This question of the tenure of land under the new Code has been discussed again and again. There never could have been the faintest doubt about it had not certain local journalists ignorantly committed themselves to erroneous statements from which they subsequently refused to withdraw, though the clearest evidence was adduced in proof of their blunder. The Civil Code of Japan recognises two kinds of land tenure apart from ownership—we need not here concern ourselves about emphyteusis and so forth—, one of which, "superficies," is defined in Book II. Chap. IV., Articles 265 to 269, inclusive; the other, "hiring or letting to hire," is defined in Book III., Chap. II., Sect. VII., Sub-sect. I., Articles 601 to 604, inclusive. Superficies is the kind of tenure contemplated when the tenant desires to own buildings on the land (the very case explicitly alluded to in the Kobe memorial). No limit of time is fixed for such tenure. The land may be hired for any number of years agreed upon by the lessor and lessee. Should it happen that the number of years has not been fixed at the time of leasing the land, then the lessee is entitled to relinquish his lease at a year's notice, and the lessor is entitled to invoke the intervention of a court of law which may determine a period of not less than 20 years and not more than 50. The whole of these provisions, the whole system of long lease for building purposes under the system of superficies, as well as the fact that partnerships or firms of foreigners carrying on business in Japan under Japanese law, will be entitled to own as much land as they please—all these things are calmly ignored by the Kobe Memorial. The memorialists write as though nothing of the kind was included in the Code, and as though the only reference to land leasing or land owning was contained in Article 604, which, under the head of "hiring and letting to hire," provides that "the period of duration of contracts of hiring and letting to hire must not exceed twenty years."

Really it is difficult to find any terms applicable to such flagrant, such extraordinary, blundering. The Kobe people had in their hands not only full English translations of the Civil Code, but also an expert commentary which explained this question of superficies in the clearest terms, showed the difference between such a system and the ordinary method of letting and hiring, and dwelt on the importance of the privilege as enabling foreigners to procure land under leases of sufficiently long duration to warrant the erection of warehouses, factories, and other buildings however costly. Nor is that all. This very memorial was sent to Yokohama for signature, but the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce declined to connect themselves with it, one of their principal grounds of refusal being this very mistake about the tenure of land. Yet the Kobe Chamber forwarded the memorial unaltered to Lord Salisbury! The story almost defies credence. We could believe it if the actors were children playing some game in which the composition of mock memorials was a feature, but where a body of grave business men are concerned, and where important interests as well as international problems are affected, such reckless giddiness is utterly inexplicable.

The wisest folk may commit errors. If we comment in strong terms on the Kobe blunder, it is chiefly for the purpose of dissociating other sections of the foreign communities from a mistake so mischievous. For this problem of land tenure is of great moment. Every one solicitous on account of Japan's material development and on account of the prosperity of foreign enterprise in this country—which is only another way of saying Japanese prosperity—must be keenly anxious that the Japanese should abandon their irrational, their unwise, their pusillanimous attitude towards the question of land ownership by foreigners. A band of unthinking agitators, prompted partly by the want of a political shibboleth and partly by impatience because Treaty Revision could not be accomplished, raised the cry of "strict treaty enforcement," five years ago. Their investigations showed that several foreigners had, by more or less devious devices, acquired possession of land beyond the limits of the settlements, and out of the factitious excitement fanned in connection with that discovery, there grew up a fantasy that the soil of the empire must be prevented from passing into alien ownership. All thinking persons, foreigners and Japanese alike, are interested in dispelling a prejudice so plainly injurious to the growth of business enterprise. But that most desirable consummation will certainly not be promoted by a document like the Kobe Memorial; a document wherein a body of grave business men entirely misrepresent the action of Japanese legislators, and publicly prefer against them an accusation of the most narrow-minded illiberality, when in reality they have endeavoured by the best means in their power—short of granting the privilege of actual ownership of land to individual foreigners, which, in the then state of public opinion, they could not grant—when they have successfully endeavoured, we say, to devise a system for minimizing the inconvenient effects of an embargo which they could not remove. Japanese legislators are not likely to be favorably impressed by injustice of that kind, or Japanese officials be encouraged in the prosecution of efforts which obtain so little appreciation.

Elsewhere in the same memorial the following paragraph occurs:—

> Definite diplomatic stipulations form the only safeguard upon which foreigners can rely, and to be effective they must be vigilantly enforced. When the port of Hyogo (Kobe) was opened to foreign trade in 1863, an agreement was concluded between the Imperial Government and the Foreign Representatives for leasing land and renting or buying houses within what is called sakkyochi or the mixed residence zone. This agreement was ultimately published in the form of a letter to the Consuls by Mr. Shunsuke Ito (now Marquis Ito) who was then Governor of Hyogo. Yet sixteen (sic) years later, in 1884, without any communication with or notification of the Foreign Consuls or Diplomatic Representatives, the Japanese Government secretly issued instructions to the prefectural authorities wherein the duration of leases—which foreigners and Japanese were by diplomatic instrument permitted to make "at their own convenience"—was limited to twenty-five years, and a penalty both of fine and imprisonment imposed on Japanese subjects for any infraction of the regulation.

The statement about land tenure was an error of fact. What shall we call this paragraph? It sets out by saying that "definite diplomatic stipulations form the only safeguard upon which foreigners can rely," and that even such stipulations, "to be effective must be vigilantly enforced." This is nothing more or less than a distinct declaration that the memorialists have no faith in the liberality of the Japanese Government or the Japanese people, and are further persuaded that the Japanese Government can not be trusted to fulfil diplomatic stipulations unless opportunities of evading them are carefully kept out of its reach. Faith, of course, can not be exacted. It is a plant of tender growth, and that it does not flourish in the bosoms of the foreign communities Japan is an unfortunate fact for which the Japanese themselves must be held chiefly responsible. But why parade such a fact in a public memorial? What can be the result except to widen the breach between foreigners and Japanese? Besides, it is against the Government of Japan that this expression of distrust is placed on record. Has the conduct of the Government of Japan warranted any denunciation of the kind? Has not the Government of Japan, on the contrary, shown uniform and scrupulous integrity in the discharge of all its engagements towards foreigners? Let us consider, for a moment, the concrete evidence adduced by the Kobe Memorialists in support of their charge that diplomatic stipulations made with Japan to be effective must be vigilantly enforced. They say that whereas, in 1863, an official agreement was concluded unconditionally empowering foreigners to lease land in a certain quarter of Hyogo, the Japanese Government, in 1884, "secretly issued instructions to the prefectural authorities limiting the duration of such leases to 25 years." We can not, of course, speak intelligently about "secret instructions." It is strange that if such instructions were issued in 1884, nothing was heard of them until 1898. We are bound to assume that the Kobe Memorialists would not publicly prefer a charge of the kind without conclusive proof, but it is difficult to see how they can have acquired proof, and if they are unable to form an ordinarily accurate conception about the contents of a written law which is not only couched in the clearest terms but also accompanied by a commentary, they need not be surprised if their ability to sift fourteen-years old evidence about secret transactions is not immediately conceded. Be that as it may, however, what is the obvious intention of this charge against Japanese statesmen? Is it not to show that the Government itself was conservatively opposed in 1884 to the acquisition of land by foreigners under long leases? Observe the date, "1884." Now in 1884 negotiations for Revision of the Treaties were renewed at the Foreign Office in Tokyo, and resulted in a draft treaty wherein the privilege of owning land in Japan was unreservedly granted to foreigners. There was no discussion about the privilege. There was no difficulty in obtaining it. The Japanese negotiators inserted it with virtual spontaneity. Again, in Count Okuma's revised treaty of 1889, which actually received the signatures of America, Germany and Russia, ownership of land was unreservedly allowed to foreigners. It appears, then, that the very Government which the Kobe memorialists accuse of violating its engagements by secretly interfering to restrict the foreign leasing of land, was readily conceding by treaty the permanent privilege not merely of long leases but also of actual ownership. We leave the memorialists to reconcile these facts. They appear to have allowed themselves to be carried away by an inexplicable vertigo, but a moment's calm retrospect will convince them that they never made a greater or more unfortunate mistake than when they arraigned not merely the good faith of the Japanese Government but even the liberality of its disposition. The Japanese Government has been uniformly liberal and friendly in its attitude towards foreigners. The Japanese Government did everything in its power to check the agitation of 1893-4, and Japanese officials since that time have spared no effort to soften the prejudices educated in those years. It is not against the Japanese Government that the foreign residents ought to gird. The Kobe Memorialists show that they can not distinguish between friends and enemies, or appreciate the ingratitude, to say nothing of the unwisdom, of confounding the two in a common accusation.

There are other statements in this strange document that can not be reconciled with any sense of the responsibility attaching to the utterances of an association of business men. It is alleged, for example, that "Japanese law provides imprisonment for many trivial offences which in England would be met with a small fine," and that "Japanese tribunals are reluctant to grant bail on any occasion if it can possibly be avoided." The provisions of Japan's new Criminal Code were criticised by a number of highly competent legal experts—French, German, and Belgian—at the time of its promulgation 18 years ago, and we can not remember that any one of them noted the defect now referred to by the Kobe Memorialists. Be that as it may, however, what grounds have the Memorialists for asserting that Japanese tribunals will not grant bail if they can possibly avoid doing so? How can they be in a position to publish such an allegation? Where are their proofs? Our own inquiries go to show that if there is any failure to resort to the privilege of bail, the fault lies with the ineptitude of the accused persons rather than with the unwillingness of the magistrates. A more unfortunate document never was penned than this Memorial. Its statements are inaccurate; it is careless almost to the verge of recklessness; its tone is wanting in moderation, and its charges are calculated to give grave offence to the Government whose good will has been uniformly displayed towards foreigners, and whose sympathy it is most desirable to preserve. Two reforms we are all deeply interested in bringing about. One is that individual foreigners should be entitled to own land in Japan; the other that suitable prisons should be provided for foreigners under detention or suffering punishment. The suggestion of the Memorialists as to the construction of proper buildings at each of the Treaty Ports seems excellent, and is understood to be the idea entertained not only by the present Cabinet but also by the last. Was it necessary, however, to preface that suggestion by a statement that "the cells of Japanese gaols are in many cases barred dens resembling nothing so much as those in which wild animals are kept"? It would scarcely have been possible, we think, to compile a document better calculated than this Memorial to injure the cause which the memorialists, in common with all the rest of us, undoubtedly have at heart.

EXPERIENCES.

"I hear so much about unprovoked rudeness on the part of the Japanese lower orders towards foreigners," says a friend, "that I should like to describe to you two recent experiences of my own—one on my way from Tokyo to Hakone, the other on my return journey. After I had taken my seat in a railway carriage, there entered a foreign lady and gentleman. The latter carried under his arm a small dog. It is, of course, against the rules for a passenger to take a dog into the carriage with him. One of the railway officials addressed a remonstrance to the gentleman, but he took the dog on his knees, and pointing to it, uttered the word 'baby' three or four times—his knowledge of English seemed very limited. He did not behave roughly, but persisted in ignoring the porter's explanations, and finally carried his point, and his dog, probably because the train would have had to be detained to settle the question. It was a small matter, but it seemed to me to illustrate a demeanour not uncommon among foreigners. Would this gentleman have attempted to take a dog, however small, into a first-class carriage in his own country in spite of the remonstrances of a railway official? The second experience was much more unpleasant. Just as the tram-car was about to start a foreigner arrived. His effects consisted of eight packages 'of sorts' carried by four coolies. He paid three of the coolies, but gave nothing to the fourth, who therefore put his head and his hand into the car and asked for money. The foreigner's prompt and unhesitating answer was to slap the man's face, and the tram started. I can assure you that foreigner was 'all there.' His dominant idea seemed to be that the whole world was in league to cheat him. His own fare was forty sen, and when the conductor of the tram said that the charge for the eight packages would be sixty sen more, he fell into a state of great excitement, protested that he was being swindled, and was only induced to pay up when the tram folks proceeded to unload his baggage at the next station. He really seemed to think that he was travelling among savages and that he had to be on his defence all the time. These are excerpts from the diary of one trip into the country. 'Like begets like' in Japan, I suppose, as well as everywhere else."

THE MINISTER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. Ozaki Yukio is certainly making his mark. We do not remember that any Cabinet Minister ever before established such a claim on public appreciation in so brief a period. The only measure actually taken by him has been a wholesale recission of rules and regulations issued, from time to time, by his predecessors, for the control and direction of teachers and students. But he has given public expression to opinions which show him to be one of Japan's most liberal and enlightened statesmen. We confess that we did not quite expect this from Mr. Ozaki. As to his brilliant abilities there never was any doubt. But his very brilliancy inspired a certain measure of distrust, and, while admiring his powerful and sparkling speeches in the Diet, in was impossible not to fear that the consuming fire of partisanship with which all his utterances glowed might be a very dangerous element in a statesman's temperament. Mr. Ozaki, however, as a portfolio-holder, though he evidently retains the courage of Mr. Ozaki the "Rupert of debate," has developed all the responsible gravity of a Cabinet Minister, and is standing forth as the exponent of precisely the very opinions which were most in need of an able and bold champion in Japan. We may be pardoned if we express our admiration in strong terms, because the reforms advocated by Mr. Ozaki are precisely those which have over and over again been urged in these columns. In the forefront of these reforms we place the removal of the cruel disabilities under which schools conducted on religious principles have hitherto laboured in Japan; disabilities which, as we pointed out at the time and as Mr. Ozaki now plainly says, were in great part responsible for the Doshisha calamity, which has done incalculable injury to Japan. Nothing could be sounder than the principle that Schools receiving aid from the State out of funds contributed by tax-payers of all shades of belief or unbelief should be conducted on purely secular lines. But to decline altogether to officially recognise the value of graduation certificates given by private schools where religious instruction forms a part of the curriculum, and to withhold from the students of such schools privileges without which they can not finish their education, is to discriminate with terrible unfairness against the whole religious section of the nation. Mr. Ozaki Yukio is probably not the first among Japanese Ministers of Education to hold that view, but he is certainly the first who has given public expression to it.

Another admirable step taken by Mr. Ozaki is his admonition with reference to the demeanour of children towards foreigners. The admonition was contained in a speech delivered by the Minister on the 21st instant to a large audience of the Educational Society's members. He spoke not merely of children, but also of grown people who, according to reports received from Governors of Prefectures in which open ports are situated and from the police, show rudeness to foreign gentlemen and ladies and sometimes abuse them and even resort to acts of violence. Denouncing such conduct as contemptible in the extreme, Mr. Ozaki called upon all persons engaged in education to spare no pains in eradicating anti-foreign sentiments from the breasts of children and young people, for, as the child is, so will the man be. That is exactly what we have often said. If children at school were taught that every one making an exhibition of race prejudice disgraces himself and his country, this particular evil would soon disappear. We admit frankly that a similar reform is needed in many Occidental countries, but we who live here have to think of Japan only.

Mr. Ozaki said a great deal in his speech about the worship of money, but into that branch of his views we need not follow him, except to note that he justly upbraided the rich men of Japan for not making donations to educational purposes, as do the rich men in America, England, and other Western countries. The Keiogijuku—Mr. Fukuzawa's College—is the only University in Japan, his Excellency said, which owes its origin to private munificence. Certainly the comment is true of Universities, but Count Okuma's Technical College at Waseda is also a conspicuous instance, and Mr. Okura's recent gift of 500,000 yen to found a commercial school is a fine example which will probably find imitators. Still, as we have noted more than once in the past, private benevolence is extremely backward in Japan.

A RADICAL RECOMMENDATION.

We suppose that if an Imperial Decree appeared one fine morning dismissing from office the whole body of Japanese officials, with the exception of the Ministers of State, the world would open its eyes very widely and conclude that His Majesty and his advisers had been overcome by a sudden access of dementia. Yet that is the course recommended by the sober, thoughtful Jiji Shimpo, and not recommended once only, but urged in leading articles published at a considerable interval and inspired by an evident conviction that no smaller measure will satisfy the requirements of the time. The Jiji's point is not very easy to grasp. It has an idea that the present regulations for the appointment of officials (Kwanri ninyo-rei) were devised in the interests of the Clans, because, while instituting a system of qualifying examinations, they make exceptions in favour of graduates of Upper Middle Schools and of the University. Such a notion sounds very strange in Occidental ears, for all Western countries make a habit of attaching certain definite values to the graduation certificates of high-class educational institutions, and since the graduates of the Imperial University and of the Upper Middle Schools in Japan are drawn from all classes and localities, it is difficult to see where their taint of clannism comes in. However, the Jiji has its own views. It opines that if officials in responsible positions were now required to pass examinations, very few of them would be successful, which is probably quite true, for after we have laid aside our text books for a dozen years, not many of us could calculate a logarithmic base or write a synopsis of the philosophy of Hobbes. At the same time, we all flatter ourselves that we are at least as competent to discharge our daily duties as a lad fresh from the academical halls. Whether the Jiji thinks differently we can not discover, for it passes on at once to declare it utterly incongruous that a new master should have old clerks. Put out all the rank and file of officialdom. If there are any really good men, they can be reappointed immediately. Let an entirely new atmosphere percolate the administrative mansion. Then revise the regulations and make a knowledge of the English language the prime essential for official appointments.

What constitutes "new" and what "old," we wonder, in the Jiji Shimpo's estimation When the present Cabinet goes out of power, would its successors be justified in effecting a similarly thorough atmospheric change? If not, why not? And if yes, what a kaleidoscope the future history of the Japanese administration becomes! We do not think, too, that the proposed plan would have a very calming effect on the office-seeking fever which the Jiji itself, in common with other journals, denounces. Several thousands of official vacancies would be something for the hungry crowd to scramble for.

FORESTS IN JAPAN.

Among the very numerous and more or less superficial criticisms and suggestions about finance that appear in the columns of the vernacular press, we sometimes find a striking statement. Of that nature is a paragraph in the Nippon on the subject of State forests. The State owns, according to our contemporary, 7 million cho (17½ million acres) of forest lands, and the total revenue derived from this immense possession is less than a million yen annually. There ought to be some effective system of forest control, for the Imperial University turns out, every year, men who are supposed to have made a specialty of this branch of study, but the astonishing fact is that the State's forests seem be regarded as a great nuisance rather than a valuable asset. The Nippon accounts for the curious state of affairs thus:—At the time of the Restoration the paramount tendency of the administration was centralization of power, and the forests were swept into the official net without due distinction between public and private property. As a natural result, great discontent was engendered, and applications began to flow in from all quarters, asking for the restoration of lands here or the grant of lands there. Several thousands of such applications are now in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, and the business of dealing with them monopolises the time of the Forestry Bureau so completely that no attempt can be made to inaugurate an efficient system of forest control. Meanwhile, sales of State-forest lands are almost always attended with the gravest abuses, dishonesty and corruption of every kind being practised. The time has surely come, says the Nippon, to draw the line irrevocably and clearly between State lands and private lands. Some might suffer by the division, but others would gain, and one result would be that a proper system of forest control could be inaugurated. It is believed by competent experts that the state forests might be made to yield a revenue of 10 million yen at once, and 20 or 30 million yen in the course of a few years. A yen per acre—that is to say, 2 shillings—would means an income of 17½ millions.

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM.

It must be confessed that the prospect of a continued working alliance between the Liberals and Progressists becomes palpably less hopeful as the days go by. The question of administrative reform is now a dark cloud upon the horizon. The Cabinet, very soon after its accession to power, appointed a committee to make preliminary investigations. It is the third committee of the kind that has approached the problem. The first was presided over by Count Okuma in the Kuroda Cabinet of 1888-9. The second, under the same presidency, sat while the Matsukata Cabinet was in office last year. Count Itagaki is the President of the third, and the Opposition organs, as our readers may remember, have not hesitated to suggest that the post was allotted to the Liberal leader by the Progressists because they knew that failure was inevitable. Nothing has been heard of the Committee's investigations since it commenced its sittings. That is not remarkable. The Committee would be well advised if it carefully kept its proceedings private until its full report was compiled. But what we do find remarkable is that the Yomiuri Shimbun, a leading Progressist organ, roundly accuses the Committee of accomplishing nothing, and attributes its failure to favoritism. Favoritism, says our contemporary, was the rock upon which the previous reform committees came to grief under Clan Cabinets, and favoritism was preeminently the abuse which the present Cabinet undertook to eradicate. Hence the last thing to be anticipated was that the new committee would allow itself to be swayed by personal considerations, and would shrink from abolishing useless offices through fear of disturbing the balance of power between the Liberals and the Progressists. Yet not only is that the case, but the Committee has closed its doors thus falling into the evil habit of the clan era, and refuses to receive any suggestions from without. It has not the courage to to do what the nation wants, and is apparently oblivious of the fact that the wider counsels it can obtain, the more likely is it to find wisdom. We are quoting the Yomiuri Shimbun. That, indeed, is the whole point of the matter. How long can the two sections of the Constitutional Party work in concert when the organs of one section attack the leader of the other in such fashion?

THE UNTIRING ONSET.

Any reader of the Tokyo journals nowa-days finds it quite interesting to speculate what will be the next kind of battering ram directed by the Opposition organs against the ministerial citadel. As a mere feat of ingenuity the number of changes rung upon the same theme are quite remarkable. Thus the Chiuo, so surely as day succeeds day, constructs some situation portending grave things to the Empire, and then asks how the present Government can possibly be expected to steer the country through such dangers. One wonders whether any ears can be captivated by such perpetual harping upon the same string. Yet, after all, iteration often makes a mark where reason would be powerless to effect anything. We have to confess, however, that this journalistic fashion perplexes us considerably; for while, on the one hand, we desire to keep our readers fully informed as to the tendency of public opinion in Japan, we are anxious, on the other, not to weary them by reverting to themes which have long ago become hackneyed. Our difficulty is increased by the adroitness of our Tokyo contemporaries. To-day, for example, we take up the Chiuo Shimbun and find an article with great promise of interest. England and Russia, it sets out by saying, will assuredly fight, and China will be the bone of contention. Germany and France will follow in the wake of the combatants and gather up the fragments. Japan will therefore be in the very centre of the battle-field. That is a sufficiently startling exordium, and we compose ourselves with pleasant anticipation to continue our perusal of the article, when incontinently we are shunted off the route of foreign politics into that worn-out old siding, the quarrels of the Liberals and the Progressists, and the paralysis that their dissensions bring upon the councils of the State. Need it be said that we are then confronted by a number of very ancient friends—the Progressists' advocacy of an Anglo-Japanese alliance before they came into office; the support that their organs continue to extend to that project; their evident forgetfulness of the fact that such an alliance, by mortally offending Russia, Germany, and France, would tend to disturb the peace it is intended to preserve; their failure to perceive that Japan has no right to add to the chances of a collision between Russia and England; and the inferences to be drawn from these facts, namely, that a Cabinet so undiscriminating has no business to meddle with such grave matters as the Chinese problem, the question of the Philippines, and so forth. To the catalogue of arraignments is now added the Hawaiian affair, for it is declared that the Japanese Empire has been humiliated by the petty little Hawaiian Republic, and that the great Foreign Politician, Count Okuma, has been worsted in an encounter with the insignificant Mr. Cooper of Honolulu. How true it is that impartiality goes out at the window when party politics come in at the door!

A MEDICINE FOR PHTHISIS.

One of those cures that are flashed before the eyes of the public from time to time, and then disappear for ever from sight, is announced by a vernacular newspaper. Tuberculosis is the disease to be conquered, and the new sovereign remedy has the interest of being compounded with ingredients so rare that the whole world's known supply would not suffice to treat more than three thousand sufferers. It is hoped, however, that researches now being conducted will lead to the discovery of suitable substitutes. Originally a certain Mr. Tomoji Shinsuke was said to be the inventor, but he now writes to the Hochi Shimbun to say that he did not discover the drug, but received it from a friend, and found it so efficacious that he is making arrangements to distribute it—gratis of course—among the physicians of his acquaintance. He adds that its principal ingredient is nitrogen, which explanation rather militates against the original rumour of scarcity. Mr. Tomoji was once a member of the Diet. He now deals in fire-arms, and owns a periodical called the Noji Zasshi (agricultural magazine).

NOTES ON NEWS.

It appears probable, after all, that the anxiety felt by the Japanese about the possible effect of the annexation of Hawaii on the immigration question will prove to have been altogether baseless. After the incorporation of Hawaii in the American Republic, the latter's rules about the restriction of Chinese labour will apply to the former, whereas Japan has succeeded in obtaining an assurance that her people shall be placed on the same footing as immigrants from Europe. Hence the prospect is that the engagement of Chinese subjects to work on the sugar plantations will now cease, and the demand for Japanese labour will become greater than ever. In connexion with this, the Fuji Shimpo says that on the 15th of July, the Immigration Bureau in Hawaii sanctioned a number of applications for permission to engage Japanese, and that arrangements have been made with five Japanese Emigration Companies for sending over 2,875 men. The Companies are the Kumamoto Imin Goshi Kaisha, the Morioka Shokai, the Kaigai Tokō Kabushiki Kaisha, the Tokyo Imin Goshi Kaisha and the Nihon Imin Goshi Kaisha.

It is alleged that the project of State purchase of private railways has again been brought on the tapis. Count Itagaki, it will be remembered, became the prominent supporter of the idea during the interval between his Party's secession from the Ito Cabinet and its amalgamation with the Progressists. The latter event checked the scheme, many of the leading Progressists being opposed to it. Some of the "business men," however, notably Mr. Amenomiya Keijiro, have never suffered the matter to rest, their conviction being that by no other means can the ingress of cheap foreign capital be secured. Military strategists, also, are in favour of the step. Lieut.-General Viscount Kawakami is said to have recently addressed the "business men," explaining to them the German system of State ownership, and pointing out its advantages. Thus, through the operation of one influence or another, the problem has found its way to the Councils of the Cabinet, where it is reported, though on very apocryphal authority, to be now constantly discussed. We may remind our readers that the railways in question were the Nippon, the Sanyo, the Kiushu, and the Kobu; that the idea was to buy them at the rate of twenty years' purchase on a 5 per cent. basis of profit, and that the State, having acquired them, was to hypothecate them, together with its own lines, for a foreign loan of 200 million yen.

A very positive denial is now published of the rumours, recently circulated with persistence, to the effect that the Cabinet had decided to postpone the abolition of export duties. A writer in the Mainichi Shimbun says that he proceeded to the Department of Finance and put the question direct. The answer was that no intention of the kind existed. On the contrary, the officials of the Department were fully conscious of the disadvantages of export duties, and had resolved to get rid of them in toto as soon as the operation of the new Tariff eased the financial situation. It is added that the talk of postponement originated with a section of the present Cabinet, who are unwilling to forego two million yen of revenue, and who also entertain some strange idea that the abolition of the duties by Japan may induce foreign States to impose corresponding import dues. The groundlessness of such a fear is conclusively demonstrated by the Mainichi.

The Shogyo Shimpo asserts that the second-class Japanese cruiser Chitose, now in process of construction at San Francisco, has been found to have a radical defect which will necessitate her complete rebuilding. Our contemporary gives no particulars whatsoever, but makes only a bald statement of the fact. It sounds scarcely credible.

THE BUDGET FOR 1899-1900.

No sooner have we been informed by one vernacular journal the (Shogyo Shimpo) that the Government have resolved to make no change whatever in the continuing expenditures for the post-bellum expansion programme, and that the appropriations for the regular service of the Army and the Navy are to be considerably increased next year, than another (the Yomiuri Shimbun) gives us diametrically opposite information. The Yomiuri says that Count Inouye's plan of equalizing the annual expenditures on account of the expansion programme—which would involve, of course, a large reduction in the outlays during the next two years—is to be adopted by the present Cabinet on an even more radical scale. The dimensions of the programme itself and the date of its final completion will remain unchanged, but the sections undertaken in each year will be made more or less similar. Whether the Ministers of War and of the Navy can be induced to agree to this change is still uncertain, adds our contemporary. They were with difficulty induced to endorse Count Inouye's project, which merely involved postponing until 1899 a part of what had originally been promised for 1898, and they are now to be invited to agree to a similar postponement until 1900. The Yomiuri thinks that this problem may affect the stability of the Cabinet.

PRISON REFORM.

It is alleged that Count Itagaki has carried his point, and that a Bill for transferring the Prison Expenditures from the Communes to the Treasury will be presented to the Diet next Session. We trust that the rumour may prove true. Again and again in former years the Government attempted to carry out this most essential reform, and again and again the House of Representatives refused to vote the measure, because the members representing the agricultural interest were unwilling to consent to any outlay which might lessen the funds available for their pet project, the reduction of the Land Tax. The Cabinet has an overwhelming majority in the present House of Representatives, and can obtain the passage of the Bill without difficulty. Of course the project is considerable from a financial point of view. It means an additional outlay of some 3¾ million yen annually, and the expenditure of a large sum on building proper jails. But the thing has to be done, and the sooner it is faced the better.

"NEW JAPANESE LAWS" AND THE "CODE OF COMMERCE."

Dr. Lönholm has now completed his translations of the various laws constituting the Japanese legislative system. We have already alluded to his translations of the Civil Code, of the Law Concerning the Application of Laws in General, of the Law Amending Decree No. 113, and of the Law of Nationality. All these were included in one volume and brought out in July. To render this section complete, he should have added the Law Concerning the Operation of the Civil Code, the Law of Procedure in Actions relating to Personal Status, and the Law of Procedure in Non-contentious Matters, but, as he now tells us, desiring to publish the Civil Code itself with the least possible delay, he did not wait until the translation of these supplementary laws was finished. Similar considerations influenced him with regard to the Commercial Code. The translation of that important body of law also he published in July, without waiting to finish the translation of the Law of Shipping and the Law Concerning Mariners. The consequence is that he now gives us a volume which may be regarded as supplementary to his two preceding volumes (the Civil Code and the Commercial Code), containing:—

The Law of Shipping.
The Law concerning Mariners.
The Law concerning the Operation of the Civil Code.
The Law of Procedure in Actions relating to Personal Status.
The Law of Procedure in non-contentious Matters.

To these he made a most useful addition, in the form of two glossaries of terms relating to commercial and maritime matters. Dr. Lönholm has also published another work, namely, a translation of the Commercial Code in French. Of course his translations of the Commercial Code and of its correlated laws are, in a certain sense, premature, since he has taken the revised forms which have not yet passed the Diet. But there can be no question about the immediate interest that the laws have for everyone engaged in trade in Japan.

We need scarcely say that these laws contain much which is of the greatest importance to foreigners, but it would carry us far beyond the limits of our space to enter into any minute disquisition. We shall therefore confine ourselves to one or two points, rather by way of illustrating the value of these volumes than for the purpose of analysing their contents.

All associations for purposes of profit, which comply with the conditions prescribed for the creation of commercial companies, are juridical persons, according to the new law, and as such are entitled to own real estate. Now the second clause of Art. 36 of the Civil Code says:—

> Foreign juridical persons * * * * have the same rights as the same class of juridical persons existing in Japan; but this does not apply to such rights as foreigners can not enjoy, or so far as special provisions are made by law or treaty.

It follows, therefore, that foreign juridical persons will be entitled to own land, since that is not a privilege interdicted by law or treaty. In other words, a foreign mercantile or manufacturing firm or partnership, registered in Japan and carrying on business according to the laws of Japan, may purchase and hold real estate. But is a tradal association the only kind of juridical person eligible for that privilege? The 54th Article provides that "associations or foundations for purposes of religion, worship, charity, science, or art, or other purposes of public utility, not having as their object the making of profits, can become juridical persons by the permission of the competent authorities? Such associations or foundations are not absolutely entitled to the status of juridical persons as a matter of right: the privilege is subject to official permission. If the 34th Article and the second clause of the 36th (quoted above) stood alone, it would be possible for a foreign missionary body, provided that official sanction were obtained, to hold in its own name all land required for the purposes of its work. But unfortunately the first clause of the 36th Article says:—

> The existence of foreign juridical persons other than States, administrative districts, and commercial companies, is not admitted.

It appears, therefore, that associations of foreigners in Japan for purposes of religion, worship, charity, science, or art are not considered likely to be of sufficient public utility to receive the status and privileges of juridical person. Missionaries, therefore, will have no recourse except to register themselves as possessing the chijōken (superficies) of the lands now held in trust for them by Japanese, unless, indeed, they prefer to continue the system of Japanese ownership, pure and simple.

An interesting point in this context is that education is not considered an "act of commerce" in Japan. The catalogue of "acts of commerce" contained in Arts. 263 and 264 of the Commercial Code is long and liberal. It includes even the editing and publishing of newspapers. But it does not include the profession of education. Japanese subjects associating themselves for educational purposes can obtain the status of a juridical person on the ground of being engaged in a purpose of public utility, but foreigners can not come to Japan and acquire the ownership of land with the object of building schools. However, as superficiaries they can have leases long enough to suit the requirements of any enterprise whatever.

Referring to a superficies, it is to be noted that the 45th article of the Law Concerning the Operation of the Civil Code says:—

> As to a superficies created for an alien or a foreign juristic person the provisions of the Civil Code apply only so far as it is not otherwise provided by treaty or regulation.

At first sight this article seems to suggest that the privilege of superficies, in so far as its enjoyment by foreigners is concerned, is liable to be restricted at any moment by special legislation. But a moment's reflection shows that the intention of the article is to enable the Japanese Government to exclude the subjects or citizens of non-treaty Powers from obtaining long leases of land as superficiaries, or becoming owners of land as juridical persons. The case of the Chinese, for example, will at once explain what is intended. In the absence of Art. 45, a Chinese subject, although his treaty footing is different from that of an Occidental, might lease land as a superficiary; or two Chinese subjects, associating themselves for purposes of trade, might become land-owners. The Government reserves the right of interdicting such operations.

We have said enough to show the great interest and importance of these laws, and it only remains to add that the work of translation seems to have been excellently done by Dr. Lönholm. The foreign community owes him much gratitude.

"CLAN OFFICIALS."

What is a clan official, we wonder. When the talk was of "clan statesmen" one could understand it, for a "clan statesman" was supposed to be a person who, by means of influences not recognised in any system of constitutional government, obtained possession of administrative power and held it despite the efforts of politicians claiming to have "the people's mandate." But a "clan official"—how is that term to be construed? Apparently it means a nominee of a clan statesman. There is no other conceivable interpretation. It follows, thus, that every official serving Japan up to the 30th of June, 1898, was a clan official—not administrative officials only, but diplomatic officials, consular officials, military officials, and naval officials. Gradually a proposition is gaining strength that all clan officials should be driven out of office. We have seen that the idea originated with the Fiji Shimpo, and has been more than once gravely advocated in the columns of that influential journal. The Fiji's view is partly romantic and partly practical. The romance consists in a desire for dramatic effect. A clean sweep is to be made of the ranks of officialdom, and then those of special competence are to be reinstated in their old posts. What on earth would be the use of removing them if they are to be immediately restored to office? Apparently the only result would be startle the nation by a kind of coup de théâtre. Possibly, indeed, there is a deeper motive. Possibly the editor of the Fiji, believing that a great number of incompetent persons have been drafted into the army of officialdom through the influence of favoritism, and, thinking that it would be much less painful and invidious to do the weeding out by a process of re-selection than by the ordinary method of dismissal, advocates a clean sweep in the first place. But if that be his theory, it is to be regretted that he does not make it clear, for his proposal, as it stands, has the aspect of a mere freak from one point of view. From another, however, we could sympathise with it if the facts were really such as he represents them to be. A new master, he says, can not work with an old clerk: the whole atmosphere of the establishment ought to be changed at the same time with its head. That appears to be virtually the conviction of Mr. Hoshi Toru also, and of course it gains greatly in importance when a prominent politician like Mr. Hoshi advocates it. Coming back to Japan, he is disgusted, he says, to find that whereas the long-desired and long-fought-for form of government, party cabinets, has been achieved, the whole strength of the men in power and of their political supporters is devoted to patching up differences among themselves, and that they have no time to effect any of the reforms which the nation expects of them and has been promised by them. The public will soon weary of them, if things continue as they are, and the only plan is to sweep out the whole body of officials, with the exception of the technical experts, and fill their places with party men. Mr. Hoshi, in short, seems to consider that hunger for office is so keen among the Constitutionalists that the only hope of recalling them to their sober senses is to supply them with food on a wholesale scale. His survey of the situation differs slightly from that of the Fiji, but both agree that the new masters can not work with the old clerks, and that a thorough change of atmosphere should be effected. As for foreign observers, however, the first question they will ask is, what is the matter with the old clerks? On the whole, their manner of conducting the State's affairs strikes us as having been remarkably successful. It does not occur to any foreign student of the history of modern Japan that she could have done much better in other hands, or that the party politicians now entrusted with the control of the Administration have any reason to be discontented with their country's position and prospects. They have themselves been the means of obstructing many measures which to the unsophisticated outsider look like useful reforms, but, for the rest, we have only to say that if they are honestly dissatisfied with Japan's progress, material, moral, and political, during the past thirty years, their faith in their country's capacities of achievement passes the range of ordinary conception. It may be true, as Mr. Hoshi says, that they can not settle down to work so long as unrealized possibilities in the shape of the sweets of office disturb their moral equilibrium, but we ourselves can not believe anything of the kind. We have full faith in the ultimate success of party government in Japan—so far as party government can be a success anywhere—and we therefore venture to point out that if this step of wholesale official dismissals be resorted to, the effect upon foreign nations will be disastrous. Nothing capable of working greater mischief to Japan's reputation could well be undertaken. It is difficult to treat the proposition seriously, nor do we think that it will ever enter the field of practical politics, but in deference to such authorities as the Fiji Shimpo and Mr. Hoshi Toru, we briefly submit the foreign view of such a project.

INFLUX OF FOREIGNERS.

"We do not expect," writes the Asahi Shimbun, "that very many foreigners will be attracted to the country by the operation of the Revised Treaties. The greater the number that come, the better pleased we shall be. But, at the same time, it is well to be on our guard against some features of the contingency. A large addition to the pauper and incompetent ranks of the people would not be at all desirable, and it is quite on the cards that India, Hongkong, Singapore, &c., may send us a goodly contingent of loafers—'three-W' adventurers. It would be an excellent thing if some system could be devised for keeping out such persons; restricting our visitors, for example, to officials, savants, merchants, genuine travellers, and their servants, and bonâ-fide labourers." Yes, of course, it would be an excellent thing, but so would the exclusion of hurricanes and inundations.

The race for the Mile Amateur Swimming Championship took place in London on July 18th. J. A. Jarvis, of Leicester, won, the time being 26 minutes 37⅘ seconds. Percy Cavill retired early in the race.

ASHIO POISON.

The valiant efforts of Mr. Tanaka Shozo on behalf of the unfortunate inhabitants of Tochigi Prefecture, and the measures of relief adopted by the Government, appear to have been only partially successful. Very pitiful reports are now published with regard to the condition of the people of the Kono District in the Ashikaga Division of that Prefecture. Their lands have been deprived of all productive power owing to the poison carried by the Watarase River from the Ashio mine, and they are almost starving. Of course their indignation is strongly roused against Mr. Furukawa, the owner of the mine, but Mr. Furukawa seems to have loyally carried out all the preventive measures dictated by official experts.

AN APPEAL.

The little specimen of English that we quote below has been in our possession for more than ten years. Quaintly comical as the language sounds, it has an echo of genuine pain that rendered it sacred in our eyes when first we received it, and would still forbid us to offer it as a subject of general mirth had not a very much brighter day dawned long ago for the poor lad who was then "siting dwon with the deeply soly:"—

WANT.

The young man, who can not yet speak the English well, and my age is 23 years old and myself nature is most amiable, here I am siting dwon with the deeply soly.

Ah! I can not learn my hoping science, so I am very poor, I am very soly for it.

I hope to be changed into the servant of the Evangelist or Foreign Gentlemen, and to be learn much or little at the another time to be work.

Ah! My Gentlemen with the deeply mercy! I hope to be notice to (here follow the name and address) If you like to save me.

THE CASE OF EDWARDS.

At the Yokohama District Court on Wednesday, the man Edwards, who is charged with fraudulently obtaining goods from various Japanese and foreign tradesmen of Yokohama and Kobe, was brought up in custody for his preliminary examination

The only foreign witnesses called were Mr. F. W. Thomas, of the firm of Messrs. Brett & Co., chemists, and Mr. H. Sharp, manager of Messrs. Kelly and Walsh. They were both examined in a private room, and gave evidence as to the nature of the deception practised on them. In both cases the prisoner obtained the goods by stating a false address. His spoil from Messrs. Brett and Co.'s was a case of scent valued at 6 yen, while from Messrs. Kelly and Walsh he obtained cigars to the value of about 30 yen.

The prisoner will take his trial at the Higher Court.

THE SCENE AT A GARDEN PARTY.

The official account of the affair at the garden party held at Sapporo on the 22nd is as follows:—"In the course of his speech Mr. Kokan Kudo attacked the administration of the island as having been one of military absolutism. The General briefly replied, denying the allegation, and eventually he, accompanied by his subordinate Military officials, withdrew, saying that they did not wish to be present at the delivery of political speeches." No mention is made of Lieut. General Naguyama menacing the speaker with his drawn sabre.

THE POWERS IN THE FAR EAST.

MR. HOSHI TORU, in an interview with a representative of the Japan Times, is said to have expressed the opinion that an Anglo-Japanese-American alliance is not to be regarded as among the practical problems of the time, and that "Japan must make up her mind that the fate of China will be settled in a way pretty much to suit the convenience of Russia, Germany, and France." Such a statement can be read in one sense alone; namely, that England no longer counts for anything in the Far East, and that things will be arranged without consulting her. The idea, is very bold. It assumes, in the first place, that Germany, France, and Russia are leagued against Great Britain. But that, surely, is assuming a great deal. As a matter of fact, the Power confronting England in China at present is Russia and Russia only. France is not taking any action to which England objects, and Germany has her hands full at Kiao-chou, which she seems disposed to develop by fair and legitimate means. Russia and England are the Powers standing in the lists. What is the real question between them? Is it not that Russia seeks to avert any conjuncture which might hereafter hamper her absorption of Manchuria? Like the American backwoodsman, she has girdled the Manchurian tree with a ring, and she intends to fell it in her own good time, pending which consummation she is resolved to oppose everything that might prove an obstacle to the accomplishment of her purpose. Now, if we look a little deeper, there is no difficulty in deducing the general principle underlying that particular proposition. The general principle is that Russia wants to have China divided into spheres of influences, just as Africa is divided. Unless such a division is made and recognised, it is of course impossible to segregate any one part of the Chinese empire from the operation of treaties which apply to the whole. The treaties forbid China to grant to any nationality exclusive commercial or industrial privileges. She is free to discriminate as much as she pleases in favour of individuals, provided that her discrimination is not nominally based on their nationality. Russia, however, having obtained for herself—not as an individual but as a State—the privilege of building and owning certain important Manchurian railways, is now said to have exacted from the Chinese Government a promise which will effectually exclude any other nationals from undertaking railway enterprise in that region of the Middle Kingdom. It may be urged, indeed, that Russia has kept within the letter of the law, since she has not asked China to discriminate in favour of any one nationality, but has merely demanded from her an assurance that she will not hypothecate the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang Railway to any foreigners, or place it under the supervision of any aliens whatever. A plea of that kind is a palpable evasion. There can not be the smallest doubt that the effect of Russia's action is to exclude all foreign railway enterprise from Manchurica, where she herself has already obtained large railway concessions, and since such exclusion is a distinct breach of the treaties between China and Western Powers, Russia stands convicted of inducing China to violate her international pledges. Of course the statesmen at St. Petersburg understand perfectly well what they are doing. They know enough of British public opinion to be sure that no proposal for the division of China into spheres of influence could be seriously discussed by an English Cabinet, and they are therefore seeking to achieve their own special object without bringing the general principle into the field of discussion, their method being to create a situation so embarrassing that England may be induced to resolve it by a compromise on the basis of abstaining from the acquisition of any new vested rights in Manchuria, provided that Russia, on her side, keeps her hands off everything westward of that region. Such a compromise would achieve Russia's purpose. It would convert Manchuria into an informally recognised sphere of Russian influence. The hope entertained at St. Petersburg is that LORD SALISBURY will agree to something of that kind rather than draw the sword. But is Russia herself prepared to draw the sword? Not for an instant. Does MR. HOSHI suppose, does any one suppose, that Germany and France would make common cause with Russia in a war against England for the purpose of adding Manchuria to the Russian dominions? The idea is preposterous, unless, indeed, we assume that Russia, Germany, and France have entered into an explicit compact for the partition of the Chinese empire. That they certainly have not done. To say nothing of the moral aspect of such a conspiracy, neither Germany nor France is at present in a position to take material advantage of its results. The question lies between Russia and England, and Russia has not the slightest intention of stepping outside the circle of diplomatic menace and manœuvre. She could not with the slightest chance of success fight England single-handed in the East, and neither Power could injure the other seriously in the West. Russia is playing her cards for all they are worth, but she is not going to throw the pack in her adversary's face if she loses the game. As for China's fate being settled over England's head, the plain fact is that England presides at the council of settlement, and that she will continue to preside there. It is always possible that, owing to some unforeseen complication, the situation may pass beyond the range of peaceful discussion. But there could be no greater misconception than to suppose that because England does not rage or bluster, she will tamely allow herself to be thrust aside, supposing there were any Power rash enough to make the attempt. Many a time the nations of the world have fallen into the error of mistaking British self-restraint for an invincible repugnance to fight, and it has always happened that when that erroneous theory obtained widest credence, it was rudely dispelled. The probability of history's repeating itself in that respect is to us the most disquieting feature of the present situation.

THE LOSS OF THE "BARING BROTHERS."

EXTRAORDINARY STATEMENT.

A Court of Enquiry into the loss of the Baring Brothers was opened at the U.S. Consulate at Kobe on Saturday. The evidence afforded no clue as to the cause of the fire, which some witnesses suggested was due to Japanese coolies smoking. One of the sailors expressed the opinion that there was something suspicious about the fire. Another, Henry Brady, who appeared half-intoxicated, made some extraordinary statements. It appeared that he and another man had been in trouble with the captain and had "kicked" because they did not think the captain fit to take charge of a ship. Brady came down to Yokohama in irons. Witness, continuing, said anybody could have set fire to the ship. As to the fire occurring the night after he returned it might have been set on fire by somebody else who thought that the day of their return would be a good opportunity because suspicion would rest on them. "As true as I am born a living man," said witness, "I never had nothing to do with that fire. Wouldn't do that trick at all. If I wanted to get clear of the ship I'd jump overboard and swim ashore. I daresay people can find out who set fire to that ship. There might have been men on board that set fire to that ship as well as I did."

The Captain—As well as you did!

Witness—Look here, Captain, I wouldn't do such a trick on board your ship. Do you know what I'd do? I'd jump overboard and swim ashore.

The Consul on leaving the Bench said that the mystery seemed to be as little solved as when the enquiry began, but for the purposes of reference he should have the record filed in the Consulate for any future reference that might be necessary.

MOSQUITO YACHT CLUB.

Last Saturday the race was over the Widow buoy course under Club time advance for a prize presented by the owners of the Kodesu. The Kodesu led throughout the race, but was not racing for her own prize. At the Widow buoy the Sodeska was second boat, having been favoured by a change in the wind; coming home she was unlucky enough to pick up a lot of weeds; and, being unable to dislodge them, had to take them home with her. This helped the Nandeska to regain her place as second boat and to keep it to the finish. At the lightship going out the Nandeska, in attempting to cross the bows of the Sodeska—when the latter was on starboard tack—fouled her, for which a protest was lodged by the owner of the Sodeska: the protest being referred to the Committee by Mr. Rose, the officer of the day. The times and handicap were as under:

JAPANESE FACTS AND COMMENTS.

The present depression on the stock exchange is almost unprecedented, remarks the Mainichi, though hopes of a speedy revival are universally entertained. The weather during the hot season has been especially favourable to the rice crop, and the total increase in the produce for this year is estimated by the Agricultural and Commercial Department to be 16 per cent. above that of any of the previous years. The excess of imports has indeed reached 100 million yen, and Yokohama alone will have to pay over 30 millions in specie in the near future; but since iron and rice, which have hitherto constituted the chief imports, will soon commence to be re-exported, Japan may find herself emancipated ere long from that factor of commercial inequality against which she has been struggling. Moreover the silk trade promises to be prosperous, and the loans from the Nippon Ginko are fast diminishing, in proportion with the reduction in the issue of convertible notes above the legal limit. A relaxation in the money market is, under these circumstances, shortly to be expected. The shares of the Imperial Commercial Bank, the Kanegafuchi Spinning and the Hokuyetsu Railway Companies, and the Ishikawajima Dockyard, which are usually scarcely accepted as securities for loans, find brisk sales at present. There can be no doubt that the present Ministry will endeavour to pass an increased taxation scheme so as to place the finances on a firm basis, and secure the revision of the Public Bonds Regulations with a view to undertaking the sale of bonds abroad or introducing foreign capital. That would raise the value of shares of all kinds.

The trouble in connection with the Hiogo Warehousing scandal is now coming to a close. The shareholders appear to have resolved upon co-operating with the officials of the company. At a recent meeting of the principal shareholders from Osaka and Kobe, the following resolutions, according to the Osaka Asahi, were passed:—(1) That the shareholders holding the same views shall form a committee, and, by ascertaining the facts connected with the late swindle, determine upon whom the responsibility is to be placed, with a view to securing the means of amelioration and protecting the interests of each. (2) That the shareholders shall appoint six delegates and entrust them with the work of investigation and with negotiations with the company's officials. (3) That the delegates so appointed shall secure the services of a legal counsellor until the close of the present incident. (4) That matters of paramount importance shall be dealt with according to the decision of a special general meeting of shareholders, which may be convened at any time at the request of the delegates, when at least one-fourth of their number shall be in attendence. (5) That the expenses incurred in meetings and for other causes shall be borne by the allied members in proportion to the amount of shares in their possession. The former principal officials having tendered their resignations, Mr. Kano Jiroyemon was elected President and Mr. Shibuya Jushiro Vice-President. A committee of thirteen was nominated for the adjustment of the Company's affairs.

The Yiji condemns the present style of Japanese domestic architecture. The advantages of safety and convenience Japanese architecture can hardly claim to have secured. Japanese houses at present are not suited to the climate of the country. The people are tormented by extreme heat as well as troubled by severe cold. An English geologist, Mr. Bartholomew, has justly remarked that the main island of Japan, together with Shikoku and Kiushiu, belong to the coldest section of the temperate zone, and the territory from Aomori to Hokkaido must be classed, in point of climate, with the cold countries of Russia, Germany, Norway, Sweden, and Canada. The atmosphere in Japan contains a high degree of moisture, which seriously affects the health both in heat and cold. A hundred degrees of heat in the neighborhood of New York does not indicate a state of things so oppressive as 90 degrees in Tokyo. For the same reason zero in Tokyo would indicate a cold much more intense than the same point in New York. The notion that Japan is comparatively mild in extremes of heat and cold is entirely fallacious. The average rainfall in Japan, according to the same geologist's investigation, is from two to four feet—unparalleled in any temperate country. As for snow, the quantity is almost unrivalled. Shinshiu and Hokuroku have falls of from 15 to 20 feet in winter during a single day or night. Such being the case, Japanese houses are entirely unfit to adequately shelter their inmates from rain and frost. Their style of construction is evidently based upon the designs peculiar to tropical regions, and their instability and insignificant appearance are unfavourable signs of the state of the country's refinement.

Information from Korea, dated August 5th and published in the Mainichi, announces the changes now going on in the field of Korean politics. A gentleman recently presented a memorial to the Emperor condemning in most emphatic terms the proceedings of the Independent Club, whose aim, he asserted, was not only to impair the national interests, but also to curb the royal prerogatives. This aroused to a certain extent the suspicion of the Emperor, whose feeling towards the Club afterwards became directly hostile through the deliberate misrepresentations of influential Ministers. The platform of the Club was represented as involving the most dangerous form of democracy and republicanism. Meanwhile some members of the Club, to bring disgrace upon Li, ex-Superintendent of Mines, openly delivered harangues in the streets, and went so far as to say that if a mean fellow like Li were to be trusted by the Emperor no hope could be entertained of the Government. These injudicious utterances were immediately taken by the hostile party as a gross offence against the Throne, and calumnious reports concerning the Club were forwarded to the Emperor. The Emperor ultimately yielded to the representations, and directed the superintendent General of Police to adopt a stalwart policy against the Club. The chief of the Police hitherto in power, being the father of the President of the Independent Club, was dismissed from office, and directions were issued for the arrest of the principal members. On the night of the arrest, a notification was issued prohibiting public meetings within or without dwelling houses, and notices to the same effect were put up in the crossings of highways. In spite of these measures the Club held a meeting which was characterised by extreme excitement, to consult about its future operations. The police, however, intervened, and the assembly hall was surrounded by a body of some 500 troops despatched in accordance with special directions from the Emperor. The proceedings of the debaters were thus effectually stopped.

The Mainichi is troubled by a number of communications urging the advisability of abolishing the Central Rice Exchange. The recent abnormal appreciation of rice and the consequent distress of the labouring classes have evidently led to this agitation. The lower orders appear to have been reduced to the last extremity. How is their unfortunate position to be accounted for? The Mainichi enumerates the following five points:—(1) The vast sums of money that have fallen into the hands of labourers since the war, especially during last summer, and which have had the effect of creating luxurious habits among them. (2) The indulgence in luxury promoted by the extraordinary enhancement of wages. The sudden increase of both Government and private enterprises has created a demand for labour in excess of supply, and has inspired the labourers with ill-advised independence and pride. (3) The appreciation of commodities caused by the enhancement of wages has steadily continued until the spring of this year, while wages themselves have begun to show a tendency to fall. (4) The tightness of the money market and the financial disorganisation among individuals have necessitated the sudden curtailment of all undertakings, whether official or private, the result being lack of employment and a corresponding decrease in wages, while prices on the other hand have continued to rise. It is true that the Rice Exchanges throughout the empire have contributed to create serious fluctuations in the market, with little regard to the injury that might be sustained by the community at large; and the Mainichi thinks that should they still continue to advance the value of rice in disregard of the distress of labourers and middle classes, their immediate abolition should be determined upon. In the meantime, measures must be taken to control the arbitrary proceedings of rice brokers, which are invariably a source of extraordinary fluctuations in the price of the grain.

The Yomiuri, in a long article, points out the opportunity of a powerful alliance that lies before Japan. Simultaneously with the restoration of peace between America and Spain the question of the Philippines will present itself for solution. Russia, Germany, and France, will probably appear on the scene to interfere in the same way as they interfered in the case of the Liaotung Peninsula. The problem affects Japan is no inconsiderable degree. China has consented to the Russian proposals in regard to the construction of a Newchang railway, and England is reported to have taken the matter into serious consideration. If she resorts to any stalwart measures a collision with Russia will be the inevitable result; and Japan can hardly keep herself aloof at such a conjuncture. It is not advisable for her to shrink from those great problems which are destined to trouble the Orient. She ought to march boldly forward with the resolution to turn the catastrophe into a source of blessing; she might do this by the enforcement of a policy of friendship with England. Lord Charles Beresford, himself an advocate of an Anglo-Japanese entente, might be invited to this country when he comes on his mission to China, with a view to laying the foundations of the proposed alliance. The Government, being entirely free from internal troubles at present, can the better devote its energies to making the country's voice heard in foreign affairs.

Now that the Constitutionalists in the House of Representatives have secured an overwhelming majority of 250 out of the body of 300 members, it is impossible, remarks the Kokumin, to expect from them measures to promote the interests of the people at large, as they are simply combined for their private advantage. The House of Peers at this conjuncture ought not only to perform its own legitimate functions, but also those which the Lower House is unable, or rather unwilling, to discharge. The Peers have hitherto been divided into two sections, the one consisting of the blind supporters of the Government, and the other of mere bigots. Neither was considered capable of playing an important role in the sphere of administration. The time has now come for them to exhibit their capacity and enthusiasm, and to show that the Upper House is really the place where public opinion is most correctly represented. It is not to be recommended that the House should assume an attitude similar to that shown by the present Constitutionalists against the last Cabinet, in connection with problems seriously affecting the national welfare. Still the Peers ought to refrain from giving their blind approval to any question simply because it was introduced by the Government without discussing it on its merits. They ought, in fact, to place themselves beyond the influence of personal sentiment or party interest. Otherwise, with the present politicians in power, national catastrophes must be expected.

Labour immigration to Hawaii increases year by year, and is attended, says the Tokyo Asahi, with a steady growth of the export trade. The following comparative table shows the amount of trade with the islands during the past five years :—

	Exports. Yen.	Imports. Yen.
1894	313,908	6,147
1895	393,689	2,163
1897	524,179	1,414

Despite the insignificant amount of imports, the export trade last year represented double the amount of exports to Belgium and Holland, and nearly as much as those to Austria. The following gives the staples sent from Japan to Hawaii :—Saké, 105,595 yen; soy, 69,552 yen; sulphur, 25,692; cotton crepe, 19,378; peas and beans, 17,042; coal, 14,500. Hawaii levies on these commodities (sulphur excepted) a 10 per cent. ad valorem duty. It is said that the annexation of the islands by the United States will not affect Japan's commercial privileges in Hawaii to any extent. Unfortunately, however, if the little group is to be governed by the same laws as the United States, an increase of import duties will be the inevitable result. The merchants commercially interested in Hawaii ought to direct the Government's attention to the matter, with a view to maintain trade in a condition as favourable as at present.

While an extraordinary curtailment is noticeable in commercial and industrial enterprises, the utmost prosperity is enjoyed by the Bank of Japan and other similar institutions throughout the empire. The Nippon Ginko's position is doubtless a matter for congratulation, but the extraordinary success on the part of minor banks is really, says a vernacular paper, a curse to the State. The number of banks and the amount of their capital at the end of July last were as follows :—

Classification.	Number of Banks.	Capital. Yen.
Nippon Ginko	1	30 000,000
Specie Bank	1	12,000,000
Industrial Bank	1	10,000,000
Agricultural and Industrial Banks	39	24,450,000
National Banks	25	4.915,000
Savings Banks	246	24,030,300
Joint Stock Corporations	1,202	243.912,840
Joint Partnership	37	6.604,900
Banks with joint funds	109	9.111,064
Private Banks	78	6 036,520

These figures, according to the investigations of the Finance Department, show an increase of 11 banks and of 6,661,500 yen in capital over the statistics for June last. The fact is, however, chiefly owing to the increase of minor banks established with a capital of from 100,000 yen to 200,000 yen. At no time has the banking business been so prosperous as at present, and the tightness of the money market ought to have been relieved under these circumstances to a considerable extent; but the reverse is the case. The cause of the anomaly is to be found in the fact that the small banks, instead of being instrumental in relieving the depressed condition of the financial community, have proved the chief factor in withdrawing funds from the market. Some of them, organised by former money lenders, have adopted the policy of issuing of loans at usurious rates of interest. The loans were issued in sums of 50 or 100 yen on trustworthy security, at a daily interest of 4 or 5 sen, in addition to special fees for the transaction. Eminent financiers advocate the necessity of destroying these institutions as a means of relieving the market. They are disposed to fix the minimum amount of capital for each bank at 500,000 yen.

A party of burglars recently broke into the shop of a jeweller, known as Messrs. Tenshodo & Co., at Kajiyamachi, Nagasaki. An entrance was effected by making a hole in the roof, and the thieves succeeded in getting away with a quantity of jewellery, valued at some 8,000 yen. During the operations the thieves were disturbed by the occupants of the house, consisting of two men and a woman. These were at once seized and tied up by the robbers, who threatened to kill them in the event of any cry being raised.

Mr. Uyemura, editor of the Iwate Nippo, suggests that newspapers and periodical magazines shall enjoy the privilege of free postage. His idea is that journals have a most direct relation to "human improvement." So, we believe, have bread, clothes, and other commodities, but that is no reason why they should be conveyed from place to place gratis.

The Shogyo gives the profit and loss account of the Bank of Japan for the first half of this year and compares it with the first half of 1897. The figures are as under :—

	Net profit or loss for 1st half of 1898. Yen.	Net profit or loss for 1st half of 1897. Yen.
Head Office	1 234 374	2,432,613
Osaka Branch	746,395	696,208
Western "	235,548	129,590
Hokkaido "	24.138	46,998
Nagoya "	132.771	5,278
Sapporo Agency	—6.935	—5 828
Kyoto "	141,237	10.549
Taipeh "	—257 156	—162,224
Otaru "	30,497	...

The minus sign represent loss.

The losses of the Sapporo and Taipeh agencies are partly owing to the depreciation of public bonds, but chiefly to the tax imposed upon issues of convertible notes above the legal limit. As to the Bank's reserves, it may be noted that the amount for the latter half of last year stood at 12,170,000 yen and was increased in the 1st half of this year by 400,000 yen, making a total of 12,570,000 yen. The following comparative table may also be of interest as showing the amount of gold and silver coins in the Bank's possession at the end of June of this year and last :—

	June, 1898. Yen.	June, 1837. Yen.
New gold coins	45.253.755	—
Old gold coins	—	31,164,148
Other old coins	238,071	220,504
Gold bullion in bars	—	19,769,715
English gold coins	95 529	6 415 240
American gold coins	1,046 753	1,046 743
Gold bullion	17 924 883	17.174 132
Silver coins	1,306 785	16 504 157
Silver bullion	—	27,755 936
Gold and silver alloy	6.628.020	298,806
Total	65 872,404	120,349,384

Thus a reduction of 54 million yen is noticeable for the 1st half of this year, and, although it is chiefly attributed to the settlement of accounts relating to the Indemnity deposits, it is not to be denied that the inequality of trade has greatly contributed to the result. As for the various public bonds held by the Bank of Japan at the end of the term under notice the figures stand thus :—

	Face value. Yen.	Market value. Yen.
5 % Pension Bonds	8 724 595	7,857.569
Old Bonds	611.875	90 377
Naval Bonds	1.530,900	1,380 055
Consols	28 876 450	26 363 430
Imperial Loan Bonds	4 382.000	3.965,710
War Bonds	1 004 500	935.331
English Bonds	132,000	1 122 005

The Agricultural and Commercial Department, having resolved upon despatching a number of commissioners to China to make investigations in regard to the steady development of trade with that country, is reported by vernacular papers to have issued the following communication to private individuals and corporations engaged in commerce and industry :—The development of commercial relations with China is absolutely indispensable in promoting Japan's foreign trade. With this in view steps have in the past been taken to despatch special commissioners to investigate the actual facts in China whenever questions of paramount importance have presented themselves for solution. Circumstances now seem to require the adoption of some wider and more intelligent [illegible]. It has been decided that a number of experts and experienced merchants should at once be sent to China to investigate various enterprises carried on in that country, in order that an appropriate programme may be formulated on the results of these investigations, for the furtherance of commerce, industry, and agriculture. The views of persons engaged in these enterprises are therefore invited for determining the method of investigation and the classification of enterprises in which information is most needed. The commissioners are to leave Japan towards the close of September next, and their investigations will extend over three or four months. The subjects of inquiry so far determined by the Department are as follows :—

1. Tea industry (in Shanghai, Hankow, Foochow, and Amoy). 2. Silk trade (in Canton, Shanghai, and some ports, of the interior). 3 Imports of cotton fabrics (Hongkong, Shanghai, Tientsin, and Hankow). 4. Imports of woollen manufactures and prospects for export of wool to Japan (Hongkong, Shanghai, Amoy, Hankow, Tientsin, and Newchwang). 5. Imported timber and lumber industry (Tientsin, Shanghai, Hankow, Newchang, &c.) 6 Market for cotton yarns and output of cotton). 7. Glass, cement, porcelain, and earthen wares (Shanghai, Hankow, and new open ports). 8. Silk weaving industry (Soochow, Kiaochow, and other provinces). 9. Peas, beans, &c. (Newchwang, Liaotung, Shantung, &c.). 10. Flax and hemp (Liaotung and other districts along the Yangtsz-kiang). 11. Breeding cattle and domestic fowls (in the interior). 12. Matches (Hongkong, Shanghai, &c.) 13. Marine products and salt making. 14. General condition of the currency; facilities for the circulation of money between China and Japan; the pernicious effects of Japanese gold monometallism upon the Chinese market, and the means of amelioration. 15. Railways and other machinery for communication; the routes now under contemplation; the principal cities or towns served, and the marine communications available. 16. Means of transportation by rivers and seas. 17. Commercial customs or usages in Shanghai, Hongkong, Amoy, and new open ports. 18. Conveniences for the settlement of Japanese in newly opened ports. 19. Enterprises undertaken by foreigners and Japanese in Shanghai and other ports recently opened.

According to the Mainichi, the silk trade of Yokohama has revived considerably in consequence of large orders for fine filatures received from Europe. This led to an unexpected appreciation of prices, 12 bales from Soshiu fetching 950 yen each, and 16 bales from Keiyeisha 930 yen. Quotations have risen altogether by 10 to 20 yen. The enhancement of prices seems to be largely based, however, not on the orders received, but on generally favourable prospects. Of the coarser qualities the "superfine" is in demand, some purchases having been made at 970 yen. On Saturday last business was done to the amount of 710 bales, while on Sunday 22 bales changed hands. On the 22nd instant 25 bales were sold at 865 yen, 27 bales at 875 yen, and 25 bales at 900 yen; the sales altogether reached 153 bales. The tone of the market is extremely good.

The Kokumin writes at some length on the necessity of putting a check on the Government. A hostile political party, it says, ought to exist for this purpose. At no time has the Government been so free as at present; it can do almost as it pleases. The public is disposed to imagine that despotism is confined to absolute monarchy. But popular government may be used to the same end, and with more injurious effect. Japan has just entered upon an era of tyranny under the form of popular government against which special precautions are necessary. "Party Cabinets" may be excellent; but if they seek only to promote selfish ends to such an extent as to suspend the executive machinery, to replace competent officials by incompetent, to shrink from making requisite arrangements in regard to foreign diplomacy, to bid for the support of adherents by "sweets of office," and to sell a portion of the government forests to fill private purses, this Cabinet must be convicted of the worst evils of administration. Parliamentary members and newspaper editors having no connection with the Constitutional Party ought to do all in their power to protest against the present Government. To put the reins of administration in the hands of mere political "ruffians" is simply a display of folly. The people, the Kokumin adds, must be roused from the lethargy into which they have fallen.

The Mainichi publishes an interesting article from the pen of Mr. Taguchi on the land and sake taxes. Supposing, he says, the deficiency in revenue to be 20 million yen, it may be asked which of the two forms of taxation can be enforced upon the poorer people with the less difficulty—the land tax or the sake tax? He argues that an additional revenue of 20 million yen obtained from the sake tax would be taken from the purses of the poor, whereas in the case of land tax the amount would be collected from a small number of large landed proprietors and from a certain proportion of the middle class. It is only right that the landowners should be taxed. At the time of the Tokugawa régime the Empire of Japan was held by thirty different feudal chiefs, who were scarcely better than drones; the tenants under these feudal chiefs have, in the course of time, become landlords themselves, and now threaten to exhaust the fruits of labour without labour on their part. This cannot but be regretted in the interests of the country.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. MacNAIR ON "GENESIS."

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—The notice of my book on Genesis, which appeared in the Shinseiki some months ago and is reproduced in your last Summary of the Religious Press, credits me with ignoring current questions of criticism regarding the sacred text. This is not a correct representation. As was stated in the preface and introduction, the work is distinctly expository and not critical in its purpose; but questions of criticism received relatively due attention at appropriate points throughout the book.

The bearing of modern science on the Genesis cosmogony is dealt with in the sixty or more pages devoted to the first Chapter; and the significance of the words "day" and "evening" and "morning," as figurative, not literal expressions in the mind of the sacred writer, is discussed at considerable length—is certainly not ignored. The reviewer is evidently not aware that this interpretation is granted as permissible by so distinguished a member of the higher critical school as Dr. Driver, whose words on the subject are as follows:—

"The possibility must be admitted that the writer may have consciously used the term figuratively, fully aware on the one hand that the work of the Creator could not be measured by human standards, but on the other hand desirous of artificially accommodating it to the period of the week. In spite of the phrases evening and morning, which seem to imply literal days, the supposition that the narrator meant his 'days' as the figurative representations of periods should not, as the present writer ventures to think, be ruled as inadmissible."

"The question, however, is not so much what the word means, as whether or not it may have been applied figuratively by the writer. It seems reasonable to admit that this may have been the case. The 'morning' and 'evening' will then be part, not of the reality, but of the representation."

Prof. G. Frederick Wright, in quoting the above sentences in the Homiletic Review for May, goes on to say:—"The truth is, as Dr. Driver clearly perceives, that the meaning of such terms is not a question of mere etymology in Hebrew grammar, but of the broader questions of rhetoric, upon which the judgment of any well-informed literary person is of about as much value as that of a specialist in Hebrew. Broad-minded scientific men like Winchell, Dawson, Dana, and Guyot cannot by good rights be warned off this field. * * *"

It is quite true that I have not adopted the views commonly distinguished by the term "higher criticism;" but it is also true that the modern conservative scholarship, which I have sought to reflect, avails itself, no less than the so called "advanced" school, of the results of the most recent research in archæology, history, philology, and the natural sciences.

Opinions will doubtless continue to differ; but it may be pertinent to the general question to quote from another "up-to-date" (and a German) authority which I happen to have at hand, Prof. Fritz Hommel of Munich. He gives the following in the preface of his recent book entitled "The Ancient Hebrew Tradition" (1897):—"In addition to those portions (of the contents) which bear on the criticism of the Pentateuch, this work contains such a mass of evidence from the inscriptions—throwing new light on the history of religion and on sacred archæology—that even those who may consider that I have failed in my main purpose will still find plenty of material which they cannot afford to treat with indifference or explain away. But the truth must in the end prevail. The monuments speak with no flattering tongue, and already I seem to see signs of the approach of a new era in which men will be able to brush aside the cobweb theories of the so called 'higher critics' of the Pentateuch, and, leaving such old-fashioned errors behind them, attain to a clearer perception of the real facts. The gales of spring are already beginning to sweep across the fields that have so long lain ice bound. I seem to trace their influence in the effect produced on every unprejudiced mind by that marvellous book of James Robertson's on the pre-prophetic religion of Israel, of which no less a personage than the late August Dillmann declared that it hit the nail right on the head."

The writer in the Shinseiki declared further that scholarly opinion is overwhelmingly against the Mosaic authorship of Genesis; but this is altogether too sweeping a statement, unless we admit the claim so often made by the "higher critics" that Biblical scholarship is not to be found, except in rare cases, outside their own ranks.

I am, yours truly,

THEODORE M. MacNAIR.

A WORD IN CONCLUSION.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—I see by Monday's paper that the editor of the Shepherd's Voice has read my recent letter about the very serious unfitness of the name of that journal.

The editor's aversion to discussing the name of his magazine in the columns of the Japan Mail, seems to me, if I may be allowed to say so, certainly natural, and perhaps commendable. With your permission, therefore, I shall offer just a few necessary words more, and then drop the subject.

If the editor will read my first letter, printed in last Wednesday's paper, once more, I trust he will see clearly that I was not, in that letter, seeking for information, but was simply protesting against a use of one of the Lord's titles such as no explanation can make otherwise than unbecoming and irreverent. Yet I could, and can, readily believe that this aspect of the matter may not have occurred to the editor before his attention was called to it; for a sort of cold-hearted indifference to that which affects the Person of the Lord Jesus is widely prevalent now, and even Christians who are zealous for some truths do not, alas! always escape this spiritual infection.

I beg to thank the editor for his seeming acknowledgment of the justice of my protest, when he says that there is no doubt some names might be more Scriptural than they are. But I do not see the relevance of his parenthetical remark about names of denominations; and I think if he had known my own belief and practice as to that matter, he would not have made it.

As I was not seeking information, and as I thought and still think that any good that may be hoped for through the editor's conscientious consideration of the matter to which his attention has been asked, is more likely to come if thoughts about all persons except one are as far as possible entirely excluded, I must respectfully decline, for the present at least, to adopt the editor's suggestion of addressing him directly.

Again thanking you for your courtesy in granting space for this correspondence.

I remain, sir, yours faithfully,

ELTEKON.

THE TYPHOON AND FLOODS IN FORMOSA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Twatutia, Formosa, August 17.

Once every summer, for several years in succession, Formosa has been visited by a terrific typhoon, accompanied by floods, which have wrought great havoc in the villages of the lowlands. These storms have been increasing in force for the last three years, until, with the present summer, North Formosa became the unwilling host of a typhoon and inundation which, if the hackneyed phrase be permitted, were by far the greatest witnessed "during the life of the oldest inhabitant."

Heavy rains fell during the early days of the month and on the 5th we had a cloudy day with light rains. On the 6th the rain increased, and a rather stiff wind blowing in gusts, together with a falling barometer, gave evidence of an approaching storm of unusual severity. By 5 o'clock in the evening the Tamsui river had risen level with its banks and was sweeping along with a terrific current, which no boat cared to encounter. Shipping of all kinds had, earlier in the day, sought shelter either higher up river, or in some of the creeks away from the main stream. A large Japanese schooner was, however, unable to get away, and it was left strongly moored to the river's bank not far from the Foreign Club.

With darkness, the storm increased in fury, and the river gradually spread itself along the streets of Twatutia, and eventually even entered Taipeh city, which is on considerably higher land. By midnight the principal streets had been converted into roaring streams four or five feet in depth. From then on until 4 a.m. the water rose inch by inch, and the wind increased until it was blowing with typhoon fury. At four there were five feet of water on the bottom floor of the writer's residence, and the narrow street in front was an angry river of over 6 feet in depth, surging along with such rapidity that it dashed in waves against the house, adding greatly to our anxiety. And as if the wind and water were not sufficient, fire broke out in two different sections of Twatutia and also in Taipeh to add it's horrors to the situation.

About 4 a.m. the wind changed and with it the water began to slowly recede, and by noon, one was quite able to move about certain of the higher streets without the aid of boats.

Unfortunately most Formosan houses are built of sun-dried mud brick; the Chinese use mud because they can find nothing cheaper, and not because the commodity possesses any specially valuable qualities. For single-storied structures, in dry weather, they are probably good enough, although even then their use would not appeal to one with regard to cleanliness. But in wet weather they are always more or less dangerous, and for two-storied structures their use is absolutely criminal and should be considered as such by the authorities. The use of so convenient and economical an article as mud seems to have appealed to the Chinese builder to such an extent that even in brick houses, which the owners were desirous should be substantial, the storm disclosed to the astonished owner mud where there should have been cement or lime, and mud where there should have even been brick and stone.

It was about the only creditable thing the storm did. It exposed the flimsiness of Formosan houses in general and the need of reform in methods of building. An honestly built brick or stone structure would have defied the storm regardless of its fury, but unfortunately there were few buildings of that kind.

The greatest damage was done near the river front and all night the shrieks of the unhappy victims, were heard above the roar of the storm. When the water receded sufficiently to admit the use of a rescue boat, it was in many cases found too late; the unfortunates having either been carried out to sea or crushed under the heavy mass of timber and mud. The survivors poking about the wreckage were much affected and did not appear like living intelligent beings; and one Chinese well known by foreigners, in whose house some ten persons met their death, silently wandered about, clad in tattered night garments, pale-faced and speechless, all the world like a spectre. Hundreds of Chinese who had fled from their houses and sought shelter in the higher districts returned to their homes to find them levelled to the ground. With no roof to shelter and no food to eat, one found them, men, women, and children, sitting about the wreckage, sad and disheartened. In some places they were gathered about the dead and mangled body of one of the family which they had with difficulty recovered from the ruins, or they were bandaging and caring for the wounded or an injured relative. There were frequent exhibitions, however, of that heartless apathy with which Chinese often look upon the misfortunes occurring to strangers, even though they be their own countrymen.

In Taipeh, which consists of the capital city and its two suburbs Banka and Twatutia, 1,398 houses were totally destroyed and 759 badly damaged, which means that in this small district only the occupants of over 2,000 houses were rendered homeless, although among the damaged houses there are doubtless many that can be quickly repaired. The majority of the inhabitants anticipated the danger and escaped while there was yet time. But others were not so fortunate, and 86 bodies have so far been recovered from the ruins. Great numbers were, however, washed out to sea; and an English-speaking Chinese informed the writer that he had been busy during the morning pushing back into the river the dead bodies which were continually being washed up on to his premises where he feared they might strand, and thus be left on his hands.

Twatutia presents a very much damaged appearance. The settlement being on the bank of the Tamsui River, on lowland which not many years ago was a large marsh, sustained the greatest injury. Over 800 houses were totally destroyed and over 400 badly damaged, and more than fifty dead bodies have been, so far, recovered the ruins. Foreigners did not escape without loss. Messrs. Tait & Co.'s large hong was badly damaged, and a second building owned by them was partially destroyed. Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co.'s old hong was wrecked and the occupants were obliged to remove to new quarters which were very fortunately in course of construction and now nearly completed. A godown attached to the hong of Messrs. Smith, Baker & Co. was destroyed and the building occupied by the United States Consular Agent partially collapsed. In fact, there is only one Foreign Firm in North Formosa which escaped without loss, either from damaged tea or sugar, or from injured buildings. The Foreign Club was very badly wrecked and it has been necessary to secure new quarters. Chinese, however, were the greatest losers and large quantities of tea owned by them has been damaged, and in some cases destroyed. Houses in some sections of Twatutia are down for blocks and in one district, which has been but lately built, all the new structures are in ruins. In one street (Kohingai) not a house remains standing, and much lumber, which had been stored on this street because the water had not reached it during previous floods, was this time swept away. Among the wrecked buildings is the large Japanese Restaurant called Kojimaya. This building had been constructed in Japan and brought down and set up here at considerable expense. It was perhaps the best type of Japanese architecture in the Island. The Twatutia Police gave great assistance and furnished food to nearly a thousand persons, and native societies also did much to relieve distress.

Inside the walled city of Taipeh the damage is not so great, the city being on a higher elevation. Still 71 houses were destroyed and 93 badly injured, while 10 persons were killed and 11 wounded. Water came into Government House to the height of 1½ feet, and the Prefecture was converted into a miniature lake with a depth of over two feet. The members of one of the large Japanese Firms, Sanyo & Co., had an exciting experience and a narrow escape. The large building which they occupied had a stone foundation, but the walls were of mud brick, and they watched with anxiety the water crawl up to this danger line. At 10 p.m. it was but a few inches from the mud brick and in consequence the dozen occupants took refuge in a building to the rear, the stone foundation of which ran higher. They had been in their new shelter but a moment when with a crash the adjoining house, which was occupied by a small hospital, fell to the ground. Soon after, their own main building collapsed, and, fearing that the rear building would follow, they made their way to an unoccupied building near by, but this also soon became dangerous, and, plunging into the water, they managed to reach the Prefectural Office in safety—and just in time, as the buildings they had deserted, together with others adjacent, crashed to the ground. As soon as the storm abated it was found that the Chief Doctor of the hospital, a nurse, and a patient had been killed instantly. In another house occupied by 10 Japanese, only three had escaped with their lives. The Government took prompt measures to afford relief.

In another section of Taipeh city, the buildings of the Appeal Court were destroyed and the Court has been suspended for a few days in consequence. A new building is being erected for the Court, but it will take many months to complete it, and meanwhile temporary quarters will be provided.

In Banka out of 1,024 houses submerged, 529 were totally destroyed and 271 badly damaged, while the loss in life, so far as is known, amounts to 30 dead and 130 wounded. Nearly all the houses are more wretchedly constructed in Banka than in Twatutia, and though the water did not reach to the height in the former city that it did in the latter, still the houses collapsed more quickly and many who were carried down with the wreckage were not submerged and consequently escaped with the wounds they received during the fall, whereas in Twatutia, the great depth of water drowned many who might have later escaped from the wreckage with outside help.

At Kelung, the sea in the harbour arose 6½ feet above high water mark and the streets of the village were covered to the height of a man's shoulder; 30 houses were wholly destroyed and 40 badly damaged. The loss of life is yet unknown. The large barracks occupied by Japanese troops were destroyed and in the railway yards there remains not a single building. The S.S. Yenoshima Maru lost both anchors, and while she was running for the open sea, she stranded on the rocks near the entrance of the harbour. Many native boats, both Japanese and Chinese were lost, but the number is not known yet.

Of the surrounding villages Pachina suffered the greatest. Here over 400 houses were totally destroyed and over 50 others rendered uninhabitable. 12 bodies were recovered from the ruins and 35 were found wounded. At Paukiao, Kimpauli, Hobe, and other villages in the north, there was considerable loss of property and life.

In the whole district of Taipeh, which includes the villages above mentioned, the losses reported up to date amount to 2,073 houses totally destroyed and 993 houses so badly damaged as to be uninhabitable. 139 bodies of the dead were recovered from the ruins and 160 wounded. Later investigations throughout the Prefecture will undoubtedly double this number.

No detailed report has yet arrived from the South, as both railway and telegraphic communication have been interrupted. A traveller arriving from Gochay by the sea route has, however, brought some information. From him we learn that Taichu (formerly the proposed Chinese capital, Taiwan-fu) had 40 houses destroyed, and that the new Prefectural buildings, the post office, and the barracks were damaged and about a dozen people were killed. Many roads running from the city were destroyed. The Twa-to and Chiok-tsui rivers overflowed, converting an area of some 25 miles in length into a lake. The entire village of Katow, which is situated on the bank of the Twa-to River, was swept away. Great damage was also done in Gochay, and several small villages in the vicinity were totally demolished. The roads extending to the southwards from Tai-ka were all destroyed, and it is impossible to learn how the southern towns have fared. It is believed, however, that the damage has been very heavy there also.

The damage to the railway running south from Twatutia is reported by an inspector who returned yesterday to be very great. An iron bridge near Chureki has been twisted out of all shape, and for considerable distances the line has been washed out and in some places badly undermined. The repairs required will be so extensive that it is quite out of the question, this gentleman states, to use the road again during the present year.

I have been unable to obtain any meterological report of the storm, but the commander of the Yenoshima Maru at Kelung states that the wind was blowing at the rate of 55 miles an hour in Kelung harbour during the height of the storm.

FRENCH NEWS.

Admiral Camara's inconvenient experience in the Suez Canal has induced the new Minister of Marine in France, M. Lockroy, to propose a scheme for establishing refuge and coaling stations in the colonial possessions of France. Affairs connected with the defence of territory abroad have hitherto been managed by the Colonial Department but will now be transferred to the Ministry of Marine.

The revenue returns of France for the first half of the year are very satisfactory. They show on the indirect taxes an increase of 90,000,000f. over the corresponding period of 1897—namely 1,395,000,000f., against 1,304,000,000f. Of this increase 72,000,000f. are due to Customs duties 5,500,000f. to spirits, 6,500,000. to sugar, 2,500,000f. to stamps, and the rest to the tobacco and other monopolies.

It is stated that a survey has been made of the route for a railway from Konakry to the Niger, and that no serious engineering difficulties present themselves. The Niger is found to be not navigable about Kardamama, which is 20 miles beyond Kurussa.

The Minister of Public Works in the last Cabinet, M. Turrel, has been behaving in a singular manner. His opponent in the constituency of Narbonne was M. Berlioz, and M. Turrel resorted to the device of a newspaper article accusing M. Berlioz of having resigned his commission in the army in order to escape a campaign. The charge was false and M. Turrel knew that it was. But he had been provoked by "abominable" libels published against himself "and his mother" by M. Berlioz. M. Turrel has been unseated by the Chamber of Deputies, and the whole incident makes a picturesque addition to the records of modern elections.

credit of 150,000 francs for the exploration of Southern China and its access from Tonking. The work is expected to occupy two years.

We have seen what Japan has had to expend on the duties of preserving a neutral attitude during the Hispano-American War. The cost to France on account of increasing her Atlantic Squadron in connexion with the war has been 288,000 francs. We may note here that the annual outlay on account of France's Far-Eastern Squadron is about 2½ million francs.

The collision between Major Esterhazy and Colonel Picquart in very differently described by the parties to it. Major Esterhazy got his report before the public first. Here it is:—

They met by chance in the Avenue Bugeaud, and Major Esterhazy struck Colonel Picquart on the shoulder with his cane, exclaiming:—"Voilà, gredin, ce que je t'ai promis." Colonel Picquart tried to defend himself with a cane. Blows were exchanged, and the bystanders refusing, on learning who the combatants were, to fetch a policeman, as called upon by Colonel Picquart, Major Esterhazy went off, saying:—"You can find me when you choose." This was, of course, a challenge to a duel, but Colonel Picquart has already declined this mode of settling the quarrel, and he will probably lodge a complaint against his adversary.

Colonel Picquart's account, which appears to be generally believed, runs thus:—

"I was crossing the Place Victor Hugo when I heard some one running behind me. I turned mechanically and perceived Esterhazy, accompanied by a dragoon quartermaster. He advanced towards me brandishing an enormous stick. I had just time to parry the blow which he intended to deal me from behind with my left arm and with this stick—a solid one, hard as steel, of which my aggressor's face must bear the trace—and then to strike in my turn. His hat rolled off. Esterhazy picked it up, and tried to stir up the passers-by against me, exclaiming, 'I am Major Esterhazy and that man is Picquart.' But it was in vain. As I went on hitting he ran to seek refuge in a wine shop, where he was joined by the quartermaster. A road labourer placed himself at my disposal to testify if need be to what had just taken place. I summoned a policeman and asked him to make a report, which he did. I made no attempt to take out my revolver. As I have previously declared, I consider that Esterhazy's life should be respected, for it belongs to justice."

Referring to the above, the Paris correspondent of The Times says:—"The Temps has interviewed the road labourer, who confirms Colonel Picquart's version, adding, however, that he was quite unaware at the time who the two men were, and that he had heard none of the words so complacently reported last night in a paper which had all along been one of the most ardent partisans of Major Esterhazy. The police report also reiterates the version of the road labourer."

KOREAN NOTES.

The Independent, of the 6th inst., publishes an autobiography of the deposed Minister of State, Yi Yong-ik, which it hopes may prove of interest to its readers. We rather think it will. Yi began life as a miner but found the work too irksome for his liking, so he passed upwards into the ranks of the merchants and sold sackcloth to the people of Sōul. After a while he made enough money to buy his father a petty magistracy: this brought him into touch with official circles and eventually into the society of the Tai Won-kün. At the time of the 1882 disturbances, when the Queen managed to escape death in the Palace by leaving the city on the back of a faithful attendant, Yi Yong-ik spread a rumour abroad that he was a peculiarly fast runner, pretending in fact that he could cover 500 li in a day. It was a manifest lie, but the possession of brazen effrontery seems to be rather admired in Korea—at least honours and rewards fall to the lot of those who know how to apply it judiciously. The King of Korea was anxious to communicate with his Queen and Yi obtained the post of courier—on the strength of his own unsupported boast—and on the Queen's restoration to power he came by his reward, being made Prefect of Tan-chun, South Ham-kyengdo. A strange translation from the running-path: but strange things are always happening in Korea. Thenceforth Yi's career became one of extortion, deposition from office; reinstatement in a higher position by use of devious means; extortion, deposition, reinstatement, again and again; until finally he obtained some high offices in the Court. To quote the Independent:—"These appointments enabled him to collect money which he knew only too well how to use for his own advantage. Early last year he came to Sōul, making himself an indispensable visitor to the Palace. But he quarrelled with some one just then more powerful than himself and, after trial, was sentenced to be banished for a number of years. But he did not go and frequented the [illegible] as usual under the veil of night. He was soon pardoned. A year or two ago a Songdo mob wanted to kill him on account of his intolerable extortions as the ginseng tax collector, but he fled to Sōul." There his story for the present ends. Mr. Yi Yong-ik must enjoy "life" to the fullest extent of all his faculties, to paraphase Mr. Henry Norman oracular deliverance. How will he end? The Independence Club seem determined to run him to earth, for at a recent meeting they resolved to impeach him before the Supreme Court. He is fully aware of their intentions, and has already attempted to bribe some of the most influential members.

The United States Consular report for 1897 remarks:—All goods for Korea are transhipped in Japanese or Chinese ports, except in the case of Russian goods from Vladivostock, which port is connected with Korea by regular lines of Russian and Japanese steamers. There are two important lines of steamships doing a regular business between Korea and the ports of China and Japan. The service leaves much to be desired. The employees are so incompetent that shipments are very irregular, and important articles are apt to be left out or overcarried, causing vexatious and expensive delays.

The editorial columns of the Independent are strongly redolent of the atmosphere which attends a school magazine—the prize mental product of the intellects that have attained fifth form rank. The calm assurance displayed by these profound philosophers when at times they conceive it their duty to set forth the whole duty of man for the benefit of the world in general and their peace of mind in particular, is the envy of men who have twice their tale of years to carry. Every now and again the Independent is impelled by a like spirit to solemnly lecture its country's rulers, and the spectacle is awe-inspiring. In its issue of August 11th it deals with the shortcomings of the Ministers of State under the heading, "Diplomacy and Duplicity"

Frankness and sincerity are not conspicuous among the virtues of a Korean statesman. The qualities which he cultivates with assiduity and upon which he prides himself most are his serene composure, profuse smiles, and consummate dissimulation. His promises are easily given because he rarely expects to keep them. All this may be the natural products of a system under which laws are made not so much to protect the weak against the strong as to help the few at the expense of the many; where dishonesty too often proves the best policy; where underhanded, roundabout methods work better than fair and straightforward dealing. But the application of these tactics to foreign policy has been full of harmful and lamentable results.

It is our settled conviction that the sooner our statesmen and diplomats give up the foolish notion that duplicity is diplomacy, the better will it be for the country. A state like Korea, enfeebled by domestic misrule and environed by foreign dangers, what will she ever gain by mimicking the petty tricks of cheap diplomacy? Not a thing. In spite of the superficial politeness, confidential (?) whispers, thoughtless promises, artful circumlocutions, etc., nay, because of these, Korea has lost the confidence, respect, and sympathy of those who would have been only too glad to help her. Our advice to a Korean diplomat is therefore:—

Be sincere and straightforward.

Think twice before making a promise; but, once made, keep it.

Don't shirk responsibility by timely sicknesses and untimely resignations.

Remember honesty is the best policy even in Korean politics.

H E. Kim Pyengsi, the Premier, still persists in offering his resignation. The Independent, voicing the rumours of the street, sententiously remarks that "he was eager enough for offices years ago when there were no criticizing clubs nor troublesome international problems to disturb the serenity of the official life in Korea."

A proclamation has been issued by the Korean police against the increasing habit of opium-smoking.

Mr. Consul-General Jordan, in his report for 1897, apropos of the Land Tax, the House Tax, and the condition of the people of Korea, writes:—The unit of taxation for land is the kyol, or produce of about 10,000 square feet of ground. Land is divided for purposes of assessment into six classes, the average assessment per kyol being from $5 to $6 (10*s.* to 12*s.*). On this scale the proceeds of the land tax alone ought to reach $4 000,000 (£400,000), but there has been no survey of the country for 300 years, with the result that the tax has become very unequal in its incidence and its collection irregular. The house tax is based upon an annual average assessment of about 1*s.* 2*d.* per house, the apportionment of the levy being left to the village headmen. One curious feature of this tax is that Sōul, the city in the Empire which has most claims to material prosperity, is entirely exempted from its incidence. A former king, anxious to foster the growth of his capital, compounded for the payment of the impost for 100 years, and although the period covered by the commutation has expired it has not been considered advisable to revive the tax. The result is that the population of the capital enjoys the benefits of good roads and other improvements at the expense of the country districts, which are much less favoured in this respect. However, there are probably few countries where the things of this world are more evenly distributed than in Korea; if there is little wealth there is practically no pauperism, or at least none that obtrudes itself upon the public. In Sōul there are said to be only a score of beggars in a population of 200,000, and the most of these owe their profession to the presence of foreigners. In Song-do, a large town to the north with a population of about 60,000, I am assured by a missionary gentleman that there is only one beggar, and he is an importation from the foreign quarter in Sōul.

CHINA NEWS.

The Chinese Government is suffering at present from a severe attack of morality. The following Imperial Decree is translated by the N.-C. Daily News:—

The Censor Kao Hsi chen reports that the practice of some of the officials in the provinces in getting persons to subscribe for the Chao-hsin Bonds or national Loan is getting unpleasant to the people at large and suggests that strict orders be again promulgated on the subject, etc. Our intention in issuing the Chao hsin Bonds was to make the Loan a permanent one, after the manner of other countries, and not merely as a temporary measure to fill up the void in the Imperial Exchequer made on the spur of the moment, which has heretofore been the practice. We have already strongly urged upon all our high provincial authorities to obey our orders to the letter, and set their faces sternly against any attempts at forcing our subjects to buy the said Bonds, but that every one should be given perfect liberty to subscribe or not as he chose. Indeed, instead of being a voluntary act, on the part of our people such procedure by disobedient officials would make it only a means of extortion and the causing of great sufferings among them. This is just what we earnestly wished to avoid, and hence we now again call upon our high provincial officials to give at once the strictest orders to their subordinates to abstain in every way from any semblance, even, of extortion on our merchants and people at large; and that each one should have perfect liberty of choice whether to subscribe to the Bonds or not. And in case avaricious officials and their subordinates venture to disobey us we look to the high authorities to denounce the culprits in the strongest terms in order that we may make severe examples of such. The Boards concerned are also commanded to take special note of this edict.

The late Prince Kung is the subject of another edict:—

Li Su, Prince of Kung, was a senior member of the Imperial House and closely related with us in the government of the empire. During the minority of the late Emperor Tung Chih, while we and the Eastern Empress Dowager were Regents, the south-eastern portions of the empire were in a state of disturbance and the State encountered great difficulties. To the late Prince do we owe the suppression of the disorders, his advice having borne the best results. In apportioning the rewards for the above results Li Su was created a Prince of the First Order in heredity under the title of Prince of Kung, a title he has borne for over thirty years, during which he always showed perfect devotion to the Throne and loyalty in dealing with State affairs. Lately he had been overwhelmed with heavy responsibilities of government demanded by the crisis the empire is passing through, and his body had to succumb to them. He fell seriously ill towards the end of the 2nd month (middle of March) during which we, accompanied by H.I.M. the Emperor, personally visited the Prince. We then thought that with perfect rest and quiet the late Prince would manage to triumph over his malady and so become once more a staunch pillar of the State. What was our grief, then, to learn that on the day before (29th) his highness had passed peaceably away and started on his eternal journey, leaving us desolate in the midst of the severe trials that surround the Throne. Words cannot express our grief at this national catastrophe. We will personally proceed to the palace of the late Prince to pay our last sacrifice to his manes and further command that the epithet of "Prince Kung the Faithful" be bestowed upon him and that his tablet be placed in the temple of Distinguished Worthies as a mark of our high esteem of his memory. He is also to have a resting place for his remains in the Imperial mausolea and sacrifices shall in future be made at his shrine during the four seasons of the year.

To stimulate a military spirit amongst his subjects the Emperor recently authorised says the N.C. Daily News, the formation of volunteer and militia corps in every city, town, and hamlet within the boundaries of his empire. The scheme is still in embryo in many of the provinces, but it has been taken up in thorough earnestness by the notables and gentry and the official classes in Hunan province. To their credit must also be given the introduction of educational clubs amongst the volunteer organisations, an example which there is every probability of the volunteers of other provinces also putting into practice. In the provincial capital of Changsha there was established two years ago a Society for the acquirement of Modern Knowledge, to which already belong hundreds of young men, the scions of the highest officials and notables, as well as officials themselves who are stationed in Hunan to await office. This Society owns a large library of scientific books as well as those treating on other branches of modern study, has printed scientific primers, etc., to teach the more ignorant members, and purchased recently quite a collection of scientific and mechanical models to give practical illustrations, having engaged qualified teachers from Shanghai. Each volunteer organisation is to have a club, which is to be a branch of the parent Society at Changsha, and the object is to entrust the members, high and low, and enlighten and educate them to the time so that in future these organisations will not be the slaves of schemers against the public peace.

Bubonic plague has broken out at Nhatrang, Annam. The official statement is to the effect that only a few isolated cases have occurred, but the Avenir du Tonkin declares its disbelief in the official statement and give reasons for supposing that an epidemic of serious proportions is raging. The place is cut off from communication, no vessels being allowed to call there, and letters have been intercepted, so that it is impossible to ascertain the real state of affairs independently. Our contemporary opines that the disease has originated entirely from "the microbe factory maintained at Nhatrang at the public expense under the name of Dr. Yersin's Institute." The native assistants, our contemporary goes on to say, have no doubt become careless; they manufactured microbes in large quantity, and have themselves been the first to fall victims to their own carelessness or ignorance in carrying out their work, and from them the disease has been contracted by others. "The epidemic thus commenced is bound to make large ravages, for we know that the preventive serum, the discovery of which was too soon announced, has still to be found. Who would have thought that the Nhatrang Institute, established and maintained to protect us from the plague, would have had as its final result the introduction of this contagious disease into Indo-China?

Chinese ideas of justice are peculiar. A native was found concealed in a half-finished building in Shanghai. He was discovered by the contractor in charge of the premises and four of his assistants, who at once bound him firmly with ropes and kept him in that condition for a day and a half without food, occasionally relieving the tedium of his detention by hoisting him up to the beams of the roof and there suspending him by the thumbs. The police ultimately heard of the proceedings and arrested the contractor and his four assistants, who were formally charged at the Mixed Court with unlawfully imprisoning and torturing the man. The contractor and his men were fined $5 each, and the man they had detained was sentenced to 100 blows!

There is more stirring of dry bones in the official circles of China. An Imperial edict was issued on the 10th instant exhorting the Imperial Ministers and high provincial authorities of the Empire to set earnestly to work and supplement his Majesty's endeavours to reform the country. "It has been the habit of one-half of our officers to observe only the technicalities of old and obsolete usages," remarks the decree in question, "and we have tried once before to lay bare the utter uselessness of such practices in the Government of the Empire in the present crisis. We enlarged upon the high importance of keeping up and educating ourselves with the procedure of modern time and warned our officers from treading in the footsteps of the ancients of the Sung and Ming eras. The times and the crisis which hang over us must force us to take steps towards strengthening ourselves, and unless we cast away from us sincerely the practices of old, embrace at once a thorough reformation, and make a new era of progress and modern education, there is no hope of success before us." In the same edict his Majesty eulogises the earnest and diligent efforts of Chên Pao chên, Governor of Hunan, to educate his subjects in that province to a knowledge of Western sciences and the extreme value of keeping level with the times. This Governor has persevered in his attempts at supplementing the earnest wishes of the Throne, and, although he may have met obstruction and bigoted conservatism in his work, Governor Chen has gone on in spite of all; and this example his Majesty puts before all his officers to imitate. "The bane of China has been the deeply rooted system of inertness and a clinging to obsolete customs. This, indeed, it should be the true duty of each and every officer to shake off, in defiance of the hostile attitude of the uneducated majority." The Emperor winds up with saying that it is his earnest desire that "all his officers, his Ministers of the Crown and provincial authorities, high and low, should keep this edict in mind, rouse themselves up into activity, enlighten and educate themselves to what is going on at the present moment, and do, every one, his best to cast off the shackles of obselete and useless customs."

L'Echo de Chine announces that Imperial sanction has been given to the Belgian contract for the construction of the Peking-Hankow Railway.

A telegram to the N.-C. Daily News through native sources at Peking states that Dr. Yung Wing has succeeded at least in obtaining a loan of 40 million taels from a syndicate, which bears the Chinese appellation of Anglo-Chinese Commercial Company, Limited, for the purpose of constructing the proposed Tientsin-Chinkiang Railway. The preliminary agreement was signed on the 28th ult., the terms being 4½ per cent. interest per annum, issued at 90

The China Mail of the 12th inst. says:—

Satisfactory news has been received as to the progress of the Commission for Delimiting or Inspecting the Kowloon hinterland. We hear that the inspection of the Mirs Bay half of the territory will be completed in a few days, about Monday, when the Expedition will return for a day or two. The man-of-war will then proceed to the Deep Bay side of our new possession, and make incursions inland from that point.

Monseigneur Garnier, S. J., Bishop of Kiangsu and Titular Bishop of Titopolis, peacefully passed away on the 15th at the Procure, St. Joseph's Church, French Concession, Shanghai, at the age of 73. The venerable prelate had suffered from the intense heat of the past few weeks, but not so much as to give the Fathers any cause for anxiety until three days ago, when it became evident that his increasing years had robbed him of the strength needful to combat with the heat. He was seized with an attack of paralysis from which he never recovered, and died in the presence of the majority of the Jesuit Fathers at St. Joseph's. Bishop Garnier was a Breton, born at Rennes on May 6, 1825. He entered the Society of Jesus at the age of 27 on January 24, 1852, and after four or five years' service in the Society was consecrated priest, working under the Mission Evangeles. He was sent to labour at Cayenne among the French convicts in 1857, and he stayed there as chaplain for ten years. Here he came into contact with many officers of the French Navy whom he was destined to meet afterwards in China. Attachments formed then have remained unaffected by lapse of years, for the Bishop up to the time of his death was in correspondence with now prominent officers of the Navy, whom he knew in Cayenne as quite young men. Frequent testimony has been given by those who knew him in French Guiana of the noble work the late Bishop did among the unfortunate exiles there. In 1868 Monseigneur Garnier was sent to China and he has been in this country ever since. Of 29th April, 1879, he was consecrated Titular Bishop of Titopolis and Vicar Apostolic of Kiangnan. Since then he has been a very prominent public character.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Pacific coast papers, despite the war, are finding plenty of space for news from Klondyke and the Yukon territory. Many "treasure" ships have returned with miners lately, and their manifests tell tales of much gold and gold-dust stored in their specie-rooms. The fortunes of the returning men vary from a hundred thousand dollars to five thousand, and most seem quite satisfied with the hauls they have made. The mushroom town of Dawson increases apace. What a transformation has been effected there can be gleaned from a miner's letter under date June 24. He says:—

When I started out over the ice in March last Dawson was a town of about 2,000 people. The business portion consisted mainly of the stores of the two big companies, the Alaska Commercial and the North American Trading and Transportation together, with a dozen or more saloons and dance houses which stood in a frequently broken line along one side of First Avenue or Front Street. The residence portion was a group of log cabins on the first rise of a hill to the northward.

I come back to find both sides of Front Street built up almost without a break for a distance of nearly three quarters of a mile and the business pushed into the cross streets and along Second Avenue. The water front down on the river is packed close for a mile and a half with boats barges, two and three deep, many of them with goods for sale and flying banners of new industries —photographers, dentists, doctors, and lawyers— all manner of people. At the mouth of the Klondike southward on both sides the tents of the new comers resemble an army in camp, and northward of the town on the rise of the hill is another army. There Major Walsh, commissioner of the territory, has pitched his tent where he can command a view of the town.

All the surrounding hillsides that last winter were merely wooded spaces are rapidly being resolved into the City of Dawson. The trees are down and in their place stand cabins in all stages of construction, most of them on the simplest architectural plans, but many being built with a care and neatness that indicate permanent residence. Most of the business places on Front Street are mere rough board or canvas affairs, put up with regard to speed rather than appearance or permanency, but there are a few quite pretentious buildings of newer order. These are, without exception, saloons and gambling and lodging-houses. They are all doing a great business.

Front Street, long and wide as as it is, is crowded with people at every hour of the twenty-four, and particularly in the evening from 5 o'clock until midnight. Life is at high tension. The great number of new comers is hourly being increased by the boats and barges, and the circle of tents widens daily; saloons and dance houses now are numbered by the score; the water side of Front street resembles the approach to a State fair.

In the hastily constructed booths every line of traffic is represented, (including lemonade at 50 cents a glass), icecream, news and peanut stands. Both sides of the street boast sidewalks, but the roadway is axle deep with mud. The street is littered with logs and the wreckage of buildings.

The Klondike Nugget and the Yukon Midnight Sun are two newspapers already established, while at least half a dozen other plants are here or are on the way.

The camp knows no rest. There are now twenty-four hours of broad daylight to every day and twenty hours of warm, bright sunlight. And there is a general indisposition on the part of the inhabitants to sleep. The hours claimed by night in San Francisco—from 6 o'clock of the evening until 6 of the morning—are the pleasantest of the day, being cooler and the light more subdued, although for nine hours of that time the sun is above the horizon. For this reason many sleep during the warm hours of the day, and the streets are full of life every hour of the so-called night.

There is one little pause once a week in the hurlyburly. Commissioner Walsh has pronounced a Sunday law. At 12 o'clock sharp on Saturday night business stops, particularly that of the saloons, including gambling. In such great respect is this regulation held that neither friendship, love, nor money can procure a drink over a bar after 12 o'clock midnight of Saturday or before midnight of Sunday. The big jag of the week is given these few hours in which to recover itself and know the joy of starting anew.

Money or dust flows into town daily and thence finds lodgment across the bars, or over the faro and poker tables. The two commercial companies get a big share of it and finally the banks get some. There are two banks here now, operating under canvas, both Canadian institutions.

It is estimated by practical miners that the output from Klondyke this year will be between 7,000,000 and 10,000,000 gold dollars.

General John S. Williams, ex-United States Senator and a hero of the Mexico and civil wars, died at 7 a.m. on July 17th at his home near Mount Sterling, Kentucky. "Cerro Gordo" Williams, so nicknamed on account of his bravery in the battle of that name in the war with Mexico, took an active part in American history, but for some time past had been living quietly on his farm near Mount Sterling. He was born in 1820 in Montgomery County; served in the Mexican war with distinction, being first a captain and later a colonel; and was in command of the Fourth Kentucky at the capture of the City of Mexico. In 1853 and 1852 he was a member of the Kentucky Legislature. He opposed secession, yet raised a Confederate regiment and was made a brigadier general, and was under General Joe Johnston at the surrender. He was elected United States Senator in 1874 and served until March 3, 1885. He was defeated by Joseph S. C. Blackburn for the renomination in a memorable contest.

Here is a paragraph that is going the rounds of the American papers:—Pittsburg has the distinction of having had the most expensive dinner ever given in this country, perhaps in the world. In round figures that feast cost its host $5,000,000. The home of Charles Lockhart was the scene of this dinner. Mr. Lockhart is a Standard Oil magnate and his wealth runs into more than any five other millionaries in this city. Mr. Lockhart has been slightly indisposed, and one evening about a week ago he arranged for a little family reunion. Mr. Lockhart has five children, two sons and three daughters. The five children and other members of the family were present at the dinner in question, and when they lifted the plates set before them the two sons and three daughters each discovered thereunder a certified cheque for $1,000,000, and as there were five cheques the total was $5,000,000.

A firm of French wine-producers of Rheims offered the United States Government 1,200 bottles of champagne for the sick and wounded soldiers, and the Secretary of the Treasury ordered that the wine should be admitted free of duty. This must be a nice advertisement for the firm.

The ways of some American newspaper correspondents are almost past comprehension. After the taking of Santiago three correspondents belonging to the New York World and the New York Journal entered the city, armed with 20,000 Journals and coloured posters showing the wreck of the Maine with dead sailors floating past. The inscription at the top was "Remember the Maine," and at the bottom "Buy the Journal." As soon as General Shafter saw the posters he very naturally sent a detail of sailors to arrest the Journal men and seize their paraphernalia, fearing they might have a bad effect among the residents. The correspondents were placed under guard over night in the Theatre Royal, and the next day General Shafter himself saw them placed aboard the Arkansas. Another journalist named Scovel attempted to participate in the ceremony of hoisting the flag over the Governor's palace in the city, but was ordered down by the guard. He then sought General Shafter. Words passed between the two, and Scovel struck at General Shafter, his blow fortunately falling short. He was immediately placed under arrest. General Shafter stated he had not ordered the man's trial for the reason that he did not wish to give him that much notoriety, and had simply ordered his expulsion from the district under his command.

THE AUSTRO-JAPANESE TREATY.

The Mainichi announces that a telegram from Mr. Takahira, Minister at Vienna, has reached the Foreign Department that the Austrian Government has accepted the coming into operation of the new treaty from the 17th July and of the new Tariff from the 1st January, 1899. The documents regarding the matter were signed on the 17th inst. by representatives of both Powers. They will be retained at Vienna until final sanction is given to the treaty after discussion in the Austrian Diet.

The mixture of spiritual authority and temporal influence exercised by the Pope leads to diplomatic incongruities. Recently, after interviewing the French and Austrian Ministers as to help for Spain, the Pope "wired the Queen Regent to confide in Providence."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The business of the Russo-Chinese Bank for the past year shows a clear profit of 855,645 roubles, the share of the Chinese Government amounting to 303,760 roubles. A sum of 360 000 roubles is available for the payment of dividends equal to 7½ roubles per share nominal value.

The Chinese Corporation, Limited, has been registered in London to take over the business of L. Spitzel & Co. The capital is £250,000 in £1 shares, of which 50,000 are preference. Mr. Spitzel is popularly credited with being hand-in-glove with Li Hung-chang in business schemes at Peking and Tientsin.

When the old P.M. liner China left Manila on the 19th July, all was quiet there and business was being resumed. The Kobe Herald learns by wire from Shanghai that several American soldiers had been killed by the insurgents during some street fights. The insurgents were being disarmed on entering the city and all looting was repressed.

The news of the signing of the peace protocols in Washington was conveyed to Admiral Dewey and General Merritt in Manila Bay, by the Australian liner Australian, which left Hongkong on the 13th inst., the very day of the assault on the doomed city. The instructions wired by President McKinley to Hongkong were to the effect that Admiral Dewey and General Merritt should occupy Manila bay, harbour, and city, to cease hostilities, and raise the blockade.

Captain Chichester, of H.B.M.S. Immortalité (says a Kobe paper) by the death of his father last month, has succeeded to the baronetcy. Sir Edward was born in 1849, and obtained his commission as sub-lieutenant in 1868. He rendered distinguished services as transport officer in the Transvaal and in Egypt, and later in connexion with sea fisheries. He married, in 1880, a daughter of the late Commander R. C. Whyte, R.N.

The Kobe Chronicle, in speaking of the career of Mr. Ozaki Yukio, the Minister of Education, recalls the times he spent in London, where "as a journalist he soon made the acquaintance of some of the quill-drivers on the London press, and in a week Ozaki was one of the most popular men at the Press Club." "We wonder," adds the writer, "if Ozaki still recalls those feasts of wit and flow of soul and old English ale on tap in the establishment in the little alley behind the Cheshire Cat off Fleet Street." It is curious that the memory which is equal to recalling so much should drop into errors of fact hardly to be expected of one who writes so confidently of his subject. There is no such hotel as the Cheshire Cat in or "off" Fleet-street. There is, however, a very famous resort called the Cheshire Cheese, and perhaps the writer in the Kobe Chronicle may mean that.

A Hongkong paper suggests that the appointment of Viceroy of India has been given to Viscount Curzon, and not to the Hon. G. N. Curzon, Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Viscount Curzon is the eldest son of Earl Howe, and has sat for a Buckinghamshire division since 1885. Beyond a petty sinecure appointment under the last Conservative Government he has had no official experience whatever, and unless his gifts are much greater than anyone has so far suspected he would be the last man one would imagine fit for so important a post. Whichever Curzon it may be, the appointment is not altogether a happy one. The courtesy lord is a political nobody; the commoner is admittedly clever, but is at present more fit, we should imagine, for the floor of the House of Commons than for the Council Chamber of Government House.

The activity of Russia in military and naval matters is, writes a correspondent, extraordinary. A few days ago the reorganisation of the Artillery, so as to double its strength within a short time, was ordered, and an Austrian military paper states that since the accession of the present Tsar, two entire Army Corps have been created, two Cavalry Corps newly formed, the Field Artillery augmented by seventy batteries, and the East Siberian Rifles doubled, and that if the projected formation of four new Army Corps is carried out, ■ it certainly will be, since the present reorganisation of the Reserve Artillery is the forerunner of that step, Russia, which already possesses exactly twice as many Army Corps as Austria-Hungary, will beat Germany or France by eight Army Corps, and will have the largest Army in the world. The naval programme includes the construction of eight warships, sixteen cruisers, and thirty torpedo-boats by 1904.

A Japanese lad named Fukoda Sakuyemon has been arrested at Kobe and acknowledges setting fire to Messrs. Mourilyan, Heimann & Co.'s godown in Kobe in July.

We understand, says the Hongkong Daily Press, that the amended rules for inland navigation came into force yesterday (August 15th) and that British steamers plying on the West River have been notified that they are at liberty to proceed by any channel they like and to stop at any port en route.

Captain Deloncle, of the ill-fated Bourgogne, was a man of many parts. In addition to his splendid abilities as an officer, the unfortunate captain was a writer of merit. La Patrie says it was not generally known, even among his acquaintances, that he had written several pieces for the stage. His intimate friends predicted great success for them.

The Channel Squadron was, on 1st July, strengthened by the commissioning at Devonport of the new second-class cruiser Furious, to replace the cruiser Charybdis. The Furious is a larger and more powerfully-equipped cruiser than the Charybdis, and carries an additional complement of nearly 100 officers and men. She has cost nearly £300,000, and is armed with four 6 in., six 4·7 in., and twelve smaller quick-firing guns.

The officers and men of the steamer Amarapoora seem to have a mission to prevent the officials of British Consulates in the Far East from wearing out their prime in shapeless idleness. They effectually prevented the staff at Yokohama from stagnating during the steamer's long stay here; and the Court usher and gaoler grew so accustomed to and so fond of them that there was scarcely a dry eye when the Blue Peter was at last hoisted. Now, after the stranding of their ship, they are making things interesting at Shanghai. Mr. Flannigan, the late chief engineer, who called forth the wrath of even a man so slow to anger as Mr. Troup, has been charged with wounding with a razor a person whom the China paper describes as "a man named Nesbitt." A man named Nesbitt indeed! John Nesbitt, with his eternal persecutions and prosecutions, is almost as historical a person to Yokohama people as, say, John Knox. We grieve to observe that for his little diversion Mr. Flannigan (who, by the way, after admitting the soft impeachment of delirium tremens preferred against him by Mr. Lowder at Yokohama, claimed that he was as sober a man as there was on the Amarapoora) received a sentence of 30 days' imprisonment. Mr. Squire Shires, another engineer,—one of the most pleasing peculiarities of the Amarapoora was the distinctive names of its staff—was charged with being intoxicated and disorderly. His case was peculiar. He was found lying outside the Public Library, entirely sans culottes, and quite oblivious to everything. Such utter disregard of toilet conventions could not be overlooked, and he was arrested, and fined next morning.

Two British warships were launched during the first week in July—the Amphitrite, a first-class cruiser, at Barrow, and the Ocean, a battleship, at Devonport Dockyard. The Amphitrite is one of six vessels of the Diadem class, of 11,000 tons, and is the second cruiser of the class built at Barrow. The Ocean, which is officially described as a "twin-screw first-class barbette battleship," is one of a group of battleships known as the Canopus class, designed by Sir W. H. White, Assistant Controller of the Navy and Director of Naval Construction. She is the first battleship ever built at Devonport. Her construction was seriously delayed by the engineering strike, but for which she would have been got off the slip by the end of 1897. The dimensions of the Ocean are as follows:—Length between perpendicular, 390 ft.; extreme breadth, 74 ft.; load draught of water, 226 ft.; load displacement, 13,000; estimated indicated horse power, 13,500; speed with full power, 18·25 knots. The armament consists of four 12-inch 46-ton guns, worked in two barbettes on revolving turntables; twelve 6 inch quick-firing guns, mounted in armoured casements—eight on the main deck and four on the upper deck—ten 12-pounder guns of 12 cwts. each—six on the upper deck, four on the main deck, one in special mounting for field service, and one for boat service—six 3-pounder Hotchkiss quick-firing guns on recoil mountings, four Maxim machine guns, submerged torpedo tubes for the discharge of 18-inch torpedoes. The coal capacity of the ship is 1,900 tons, and she will have a complement of 751 officers and men. She is so heavily armoured that projectiles from the ordinary types of guns would have practically no effect on her hull.

A naval court-martial was held on July 24th on board the Nile, at Devonport, for the trial of William Matthews, signalman of H.M.S. Ganges, charged with having stolen a confidential auxillary signal-book, and with desertion. The prisoner pleaded guilty on both charges, and a circumstantial letter showed that he deserted at Falmouth on April 20, and surrendered to the Coastguard at Clontarf, Ireland, on April 29. On being brought back to the Ganges he made a confession of having stolen a confidential auxiliary signal-book between April 1 and November 22 last year, when on the Nile, on the Medi erranean Station, but this confession was not read in court. It is understood that the prisoner intended selling the signal-book to a foreign Power, the name of which was not divulged. Witnesses were brought from the Mediterraneau Station, where the offence was committed, to give evidence at the trial. In throwing himself upon the mercy of the court, the prisoner asked them to take into consideration the monetary advantages which were offered to him, and that, after he has stolen the signal book, his conscience pricked him, and he burned the book and took the consequences of making a confession, rather than being branded as a traitor to his Queen and country. If he had not done this, the theft could not have been discovered, and serious consequences might have arisen from the carrying out of his original intention. The prisoner's character sheets showed that he was rated very good for character and ability. Matthews was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment with hard labour, and ordered to be dismissed from the service with disgrace. After the court-martial, it transpired that the confession which was withheld from the court contained a sensational statement with reference to negotiations which the prisoner entered upon for the disposal of the signal-book.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

(Before RALPH G. E. FORSTER, Esq., Acting Assistant Judge.)

(FRIDAY, August 19th.)

THE LEOPOLD CASE.

The hearing of the charges against Charles Emil Leopold was continued this morning, Mr. H. C. Litchfield and Mr. J. F. Lowder again appearing for the prosecution, Professor Terry for the defence, and Mr. A. B. Walford for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

James Maclean, accountant in the employ of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, produced cheques drawn by Mr. Leopold from 1st December last to date. He also produced and examined copies of the bank ledgers. The entries in the ledgers were made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and the ledgers themselves were in the custody of the bank. He had examined the copies he now produced, and compared them with the original entries, with which they were identical. The first sheet produced was extracted from the 1897 ledger; and the others from the 1898 ledger. In these papers were set out the particulars of the whole of accused's dealings with the bank from June 30th, 1897, to June 30th, 1898. There was an entry under date 9th February, 1898, of yen 28,000, which read Russo-Union Bank, but which should be Russo-Chinese Bank, the writing being very indistinct in the cheque. Against the 14th February was an entry of yen 28,091.61 which was paid into the bank on the 9th of the month, and was by oversight credited to another account. On the 14th the mistake was discovered and the sum put to Mr. Leopold's account, showing that really no overdraft occurred during that period at all. These were all the explanations he had to offer on the documents.

Professor Terry had no questions to ask.

Herbert Maurice Bevis, Manager of the Yokohama Branch of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, identified the letter written to the bank by Leopold in regard to the first alleged shipment of furs, to the value of £1,250. He said that if he had known that the goods had not been shipped he should certainly not have purchased accused's draft. He did so in the belief that the bill of lading, the invoice, and marine policy were genuine documents, and that the statements contained therein and in accused's letter to the Bank were true. The same remark applied to the other transactions in which the Bank purchased accused's drafts on Lampson's. From about the beginning of this year witness instructed the accountant that accused was not ■ be allowed an overdraft, and he also communicated his decision verbally to accused. His cheques would therefore not have been honoured unless the account had been at credit.

By Professor Terry:—Witness knew something of the firm of Lampson and Co., and understood they were a responsible and respectable firm—first class people. If it appeared by the Bank ledger that Leopold's account was overdrawn on one or two occasions, the fact was unknown to witness. On referring to the ledger witness pointed out that the overdrafts were only for a part of a day; the deficit existing during the earlier part of the day was wiped out by a sum to accused's credit entered later in the day. These were not really overdrafts; the bills to accused's credit were already in the bank, but the credit entry had not come up from the bill department. The accused's credit from Lampson's was what he called a mercantile credit; being from a first-class firm, he accepted it, but at the same time in the Bank's letter to accused a hint was given that he was not freed from responsibility as the drawer of the bills.

Togashi Fusaharu, in the employ of the Pier, Traffic, and Lighter Company, said the company acted as agents for Ahrens and Co. A shipper for the Hohenzollern would come to their company with two blue forms provided by Ahrens and Co., such as those produced. One was kept in the Pier Co.'s office; one was given back signed to the shipper. The Pier Company afterwards took charge of the cargo. With the cargo they sent out three shipping forms on white paper. One was kept in the office; one was retained on board the Hohenzollern; and the other came back to the agents with the mate's receipt. Witness produced a batch of blue forms ranging from December last to April. He had searched through the forms for shipments of furs in Leopold's name marked with the L.L. in a diamond described by Leopold in his letters to the bank as the distinguishing mark of shipments to Lampson. He found the entries of April 14th to which reference was made by the witness Harmsen the previous day.

This concluded the present case for the prosecution, and Mr. Litchfield applied that the accused should be committed for trial. He asked leave, however, to amend the charge as laid in order that the official of the court who would be entrusted with the case in the event of the accused being committed for trial might have the opportunity of framing his charges in accordance with the 90th section of 24th and 25th Victoria, Chapter 96, as well as under the two sections which he (Mr. Litchfield) had mentioned on the opening day. The 90th section provided that whoever with intent to defraud induced any other person to execute, make, accept, endorse, or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or write or affix his name or that of any other person in order that the same might be afterwards used or dealt with as a valuable security was guilty of a misdemeanour. He asked that the charges might be amended by the addition of the following:

> The said Emil Wismer further charges that the said Charles Emil Leopold on 31st December unlawfully and designedly did falsely pretend that he had shipped or that he was possessed of and was about to ship on board the steamship Hohenzollern 50 cases of furs and on such false pretences did induce Albert Hofmann to make and sign two valuable securities, to wit, a bill of lading stating that 10 cases of furs had been shipped and another bill of lading that 40 cases of furs had been shipped on board the said steam ship Hohenzollern with intent to defraud whereas in truth and in fact he did not ship such cases of furs or any of them, as in making such false pretences he then well knew.

He (Mr. Litchfield) had further to apply, on the evidence already adduced, to further amend the charge in order to give the court the opportunity of making a charge under the Debtors' Act, of 1869. The thirteenth section provided that any person who obtained credit by means of false pretences was guilty of a misdemeanous. He proposed to add the following to the charge:—

> The said Emil Wismer further charges that on or about 31st December, 1897, he incurred certain debts to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, for which debts he obtained credit by the false pretence that he had shipped 50 cases of furs on board the Hohenzollern for London, and that afterwards, namely, on or about 10th January, 1898, on or about 14th February, 1898, on or about 21st February, 1898, and on or about 7th April, 1898, he incurred to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation certain other debts to the amount specified in the foregoing charge, for which he obtained credit with the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation by the false pretence that he had shipped on board the steamship Hohenzollern for London cases of furs heretobefore mentioned.

Mr. Litchfield explained that the amended charge referred to the same dates, involved the same sums, and covered practically the same facts. The application was for the purpose of filling in any gap which might possibly be open—he did not for a moment suggest that there was any likelihood of such being the case—in the charge.

Mr. Terry suggested that he had a very good right to oppose an amendment of the charge after all the evidence had been given, but he did not want to make any captious objections for the mere sake of delay. He understood that these amendments could be made the subject of a separate charge, as they were, though practically identical, separate offences in the eyes of the law. He should like, however, if his consent was necessary, to give it on the condition that the prosecution should understand that as these charges were a repetition of the same matter and did not increase the gravity of the offence, they therefore did not justify any increase in the amount of bail.

His Honour remarked that it was necessary, before asking the accused whether he had any statement to make, to read over the whole of the depositions to him.

Professor Terry said the depositions had already been read through before the different witnesses, and the accused had heard them. Accused would not care to make any statement and he did not wish that the depositions should be read over again.

His Honour said from the rules of the Court it certainly looked as if the depositions should be read over again.

Mr. Lowder remarked that he remembered a previous case in which, the accused expressing himself satisfied, the reading of the depositions was dispensed with.

His Honour:—Well, you have quoted a precedent, and if counsel on the other side raises no objection we may take them as read. (To accused) Are you content?

Accused:—I am content.

The charge was then read over, and accused, after the usual formal warning, asked if he had any statement to make.

Accused:—No statement, sir.

Professor Terry at this point asked that the order of committal should be made after office. Accused's sureties were not present, and as his present bail expired immediately on the committal for trial he would have to remain in custody until a fresh application for bail was made. The sureties would be in Court in the afternoon, and he therefore asked that the order should be made then.

An adjournment was accordingly made. On the Court reassembling His Honour told the accused that he was committed for trial both on the original and the added charges.

The application for bail was heard in chambers and Mr. H. J. Snow was substituted in place of Captain Forbes as one of the sureties, the others being Messrs. J. W. Cain and I. Bunting.

IN GERMAN NEW GUINEA.

The western half of the island of New Guinea belongs to the Dutch; the eastern half is divided between England and Germany, the latter occupying the northern part with the adjacent islands of the Bismarck Archipelago. A North German Lloyd steamer connects Singapore with the German colony, making the voyage there and back in about two months. This steamer is generally more full when going to German New Guinea than when returning, for more people go to that country than ever come back. It is one of the most unhealthy regions that has ever been seriously colonised: not only do Europeans suffer from its climate, but Malays; in fact, the native Papuans are the only people who thrive there. Not long ago the steamer took out 400 Chinese as an experiment in colonising. Two months later, on his next trip, the captain inquired how the experiments had answered. Only 80 Chinamen appeared as an answer to that question, malaria and dysentery had accounted for the rest. On board the German steamer Papuans are gradually being drafted into the crew to replace the Malays, and so far there are four brown "boys" from New Pommern and New Mecklenburg (German for New Britain and New Ireland), and one huge black fellow from Bougainville Island. All these boys come from cannibal tribes, and possibly they sometimes eye the succulent passenger wistfully. The Bougainville boy is said to have expressed regret that by coming on the steamer he was missing a special feast at home, and he wears a soft black felt wideawake hat which looks as if it must have belonged to a missionary. These natives appear contented, being well treated on board; but possibly this is due to the fact that their present voyage is a sort of trial trip, after which they are to go as advertisements fat and well-looking to their homes, to tell their fellows the joys of being a sailor, and to bring back recruits for the crew.

Recently, when the steamer was at Matupi, the chief settlement in the Bismark Archipelago, the son of the King of Lord Howe Island came on board to arrange to bring some of his subjects as sailors. Never having seen a steamer before, he was much impressed by its wonders, and expressed the opinion that the steamer was "plenty too much big," and Lord Howe Island "plenty too much small." His feelings, when a lump of ice was placed on the palm of his hand, were evidently of a most thrilling description. He exclaimed that he was being burned. But what pleased him most of all were the electric bells. That the mere pressing of a white knob should cause a pretty sound followed by the punctual appearance of a Chinese steward was to him an endless source of amusement, and he continued pressing the button long after every excuse for ringing had been exhausted, and till even the impassive Chinaman showed signs of being slightly bored by the joke.

The New Guinea Company, who are the chartered company of the country, have for some time been in treaty for transferring their sphere of operations to the German Government, but a new phase has been put on the matter by the discovery of gold in the interior. It is reported that some English prospectors, having unearthed gold in German territory near the Bismarck Mountains, have offered a large sum for a mining concession. Gold-seekers from Australia have for some time been trying their luck in these regions, and not long ago a party of five were picked up in extremities on a raft. Driven to the coast by the natives, they had lost their boats, and drifted for several days on a hastily constructed raft, quenching their thirst by boiling sea-water, and catching the steam in a cloth, from which they wrung out the drops of fresh water. The only drawback to this ingenious method was that they were gradually using up their raft as firewood. They had a fair lot of gold in their pockets, but hardly any food, and a good price would probably have been paid on that raft for a pound of biscuits.

The islands of the Archipelago are not so unhealthy as the mainland of New Guinea, and at Herbertshöhe and Matupi, distant from each other about two hours pull in a boat, lies the main settlement of Europeans, numbering about thirty. At the former place the Roman Catholics have recently erected an imposing iron church with double spires. The European houses are built in an attractive style of wood with a verandah all round, and the whole structure is raised about six feet from the ground on cement blocks to keep the floor above the damp malarial soil. Wood has to be used for building owing to the frequency of earthquakes, which add another drawback to these regions. The scenery, with its volcanoes and wooded mountains, is in many places very fine; and the natives, who are as uncouth and nuclad as can be found anywhere, excite one's interest and disgust in about equal degrees. On the whole, the country is more suited for a visit—and that a flying one—than for a lengthy stay. There is probably no less inviting colony, unless it be German South Africa: for there, not only can men not live, but even the beasts commit suicide, if one may judge from the fact that out of eight camels which were imported into the South-West African colony, seven promptly rushed out to sea and drowned themselves.

To the globe trotter the question of curios is always important, and in this respect New Guinea produces many things of interest to a collector. The Papuans have decidedly artistic instincts, and the carvings of grotesque masks, images, and pillows, on all of which the Papuan countenance, with its prominent long nose, is faithfully reproduced, are quite remarkable, especially as the carving implements are only sharp stones and shells. The usual work is shells, beads, and strings, beautified by various, coloured feather trimmings, and spears and arrows are compounded with an ingenious mixture of art and deviltry.

Almost every village on the mainland, and every island, has its own special language, and the only common tongue is pidjin English, in which the natives manage to express themselves very ingeniously. Thus a train is "steamer belong bush," a bald man is described as "that fellow belong cocoanut no plenty too much grass," while a black servant, being asked what his master was doing, and wishing to express that he was playing the piano, said, "he fight big wood fellow, make him cry plenty too much." Not a bad description of a German pianist. At present the Germans have to learn to master pidjin English; whether they will ever introduce pidjin German remains to be seen, but perhaps some day the natives may learn to shout "Hoch!" for a "grosse fellow Kaiser."—The Globe.

Russia has demanded China's assurance to the effect that even when English capital is to be employed in constructing the Shanghai-kwan to Newchang Railway, the line will never be used as security, nor that any supervision of whatsoever character shall be invested in aliens. China has acquiesced to this demand. It is supposed here that England will not consent to furnish the loan under such conditions.

NOTES.

(a) Particular attention should be devoted to the manner in which Black as second player gets up an attack; in respect of this the game is an example which may be followed with advantage.

(b) This move facilitates Black's design. We should have preferred R to Kt sq; after this neither Q to R 3 nor P to KKt 4 were possible, owing to White's threat of 9—P to K 4.

(c) We should have preferred P to B 4.

(d) A reasonable and promising advance.

(e) Things were safe for the moment; it was not likely that Black would play RP takes P; as this would liberate White's B and Kt. White should, therefore, have tried to consolidate his game by such moves as P to B 5 and B to Q 3.

(f) Black threatened Kt takes P, as the Q could not retake owing to B to Kt 3. White now suffers through having neglected to play P to B 5 to prevent disintegration on the Q's wing also.

(g) Very clever. R takes Kt would obviously be unprofitable now, and it is surprising that White yielded to the temptation later on.

(h) A pretty finish to an incisively played game. Of course if 27—K takes R, Kt-Kt 5 ch wins the Q.

(i) White had no defence. 28—Kt to Kt 2 was impossible owing to Kt takes P ch; or if 28—Q to K 4, R to R 8 ch, 29—K to B 2, Q to R 5 ch, and mate next move.

NOTE.

(a) White's play is very vigorous, but he had only to take full advantage of the position. Black compromised his game by advancing his K side pawns. The game is very pleasing. The sacrifice of R for B at move 22, &c., is obvious and conclusive.

NOTES.

(a) The usual continuation, of course, is P takes P. The text move was first played by Tschigorin v. Rosenthal in the London Tournament, 1883.

(b) Up to here both sides follow the game mentioned, but here Dr. Tarrasch improves upon Rosenthal's 12..... Q to B 3 with the text-move.

(c) It is difficult to find the best continuation now, White having his pieces well posted. The tempting 20..... P to B 5, for instance, would be bad, because of Kt takes B, Q takes Kt; Q takes P with advantage. The text-move, however seems not to be satisfactory either, as White gives up two minor pieces for the exchange and two pawns.

(d) Kt takes B seems to retain the pawn ahead.

(e) This line of play yields White the best chances, independently of the result of the game.

(f) K to Kt sq might be considered as a preferable alternative.

(g) If Kt takes P, then R to R sq, &c.

(h) Perhaps Dr. Tarrasch could have played the ending better, but it is one of extreme difficulty to conduct in actual play.—Field.

THE GREATEST WONDER OF MODERN TIMES

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

PERSONS suffering from weak or debilitated constitutions, will discover that by the use of this wonderful medicine there is "Health for all." The blood is the fountain of life, and its purity can be maintained by the use of these Pills

Sir Samuel Baker, in his work entitled "The Nile Tributaries in Abyssinia," says—"I ordered the dragoman Mahomet to inform the Fakir that I was a Doctor, and I had the best medicines at the service of the sick, with advice gratis. In a short time I had many applicants, to whom I served out a quantity of Holloway's Pills. These are most useful to an explorer, as, possessing undistakable purgative properties, they create an undeniable effect upon the patient, which satisfies them of their value."

SIMPLE, SAFE, AND CERTAIN.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT

Is a certain remedy for bad legs, bad breasts, and ulcerations of all kinds. It acts miraculously in healing ulcerations, curing skin diseases, and in arresting and subduing all inflammations.

Mr. J. T. Cooper, in his account of his extraordinary travels in China, published in 1871, says—"I had with me a quantity of Holloway's Ointment. I gave some to the people, and nothing could exceed their gratitude; and, in consequence, milk, fowls, butter, and horse feed poured in upon us, until at last a teaspoonful of Ointment was worth a fowl and any quantity of peas, and the demand became so great that I was obliged to lock up the small remaining "stock."

Sold by all Chemists and Medicine Vendors throughout the World. May 21, 1897.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor, at 51, Main Street, Settlement, by Arthur Reginald Brown, of No. 3-C, Bluff, Yokohama, Saturday, August 27, 1898.

THE Kyoto Agricultural and Commercial Bank have applied to the Kyoto District Court for an order to confiscate the properties of Mr. Kurakawa, Director of the Japan Trading Co., Kyoto, and the shareholders, Messrs. AGAIN the province of Kwangsi is the scene of a rebellion of a serious nature. A party of rebels has marched to a spot 50 miles north-east of Canton. The northern gate of the city is strongly defended by the Black Flags. The rebel army has declared itself in a most resolute manner to be intent on the expulsion of foreigners. The press of Canton has been prohibited by the authorities from reporting the victory of the rebels.

IN taking a review of the trade of the week, as regards imports nothing new can be said. Both in textiles and metals the market is entirely without life. Beyond the usual business in sugar there is nothing doing. On the export side, the tea trade continues active, and large purchases have been made at prices ranging from $35 per picul for the best quality to $21 for commonest kinds. There is still a big stock on hand. Raw silk moves off fairly well, but

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

Japanese journalists continue to discuss the Philippine problem with keen interest. There is now no suggestion of any alternative policy. All agree that Japan's interests and the preservation of the peace of the East will be best consulted if the islands pass finally into the hands of America: their retention by Spain would be a standing invitation to foreign aggression, now that the helplessness of that Power has been demonstrated. Concerning the objection that in order to subjugate the insurgents and garrison the islands the United States would have to employ a force larger than the whole of her present standing army, the Kokumin urges that such considerations ought not to weigh with her. She did not take any account of the cost when she engaged in war solely for the sake of rescuing the Cubans from misgovernment and oppression, and she ought to pursue her magnanimous policy towards Manila also though the effort may be considerable. It is interesting to note that Japanese writers do not regard as worthy of discussion the idea of recognising the independence of the islands for which Aguinaldo and his people have fought. They have ceased to pay any attention to that solution of the problem. Obviously a rooted conviction exists that Germany, France and Russia have entered into some kind of union, or arrived at an understanding, and that, in the event of their not finding the decision of the Paris Conference to their liking, they will interfere resolutely. In order to guard against that contingency, Japan should approach England and America, so that the trio may be prepared to take concerted action. It is unnecessary to repeat the arguments employed. Neither the Yomiuri, the Mainichi, nor the Kokumin, which are now most prominent in this discussion, contributes any idea that has not been advanced more than once already.

Marquis Ito's visit to Korea having produced a Pro-Japanese feeling in the official circles of that country, for the moment at all events, it is suggested by the Yomuri Shimbun that the opportunity should be realized to push the question of the Sōul Fusan Railway. Japan has treated this matter with much patience. The grant of a charter for the construction of the line was one of the promises made by Korea after the war of 1894-5, it being stipulated that the details should be subsequently arranged. Every effort made since that time to obtain the fulfilment of the promise has been defeated, the Korean authorities always finding some excuse for evasion or postponement. There is a limit to Japan's long suffering. Her Representative in Sōul had better make another appeal to Korea's sense of justice and honour.

With reference to this subject of the Sōul-Fusan Railway, the Shogyo Shimpo alleges that Korean officialdom is divided between three opinions. One is that the charter should not be given but sold to Japan, and that if the matter is adroitly manipulated, the Treasury may be enriched to the extent of a million yen. Another is that the concession should be made conditional upon Japan's agreeing to surrender the Korean political refugees now living in this country. The third is that as the blood of the Korean Queen stains Japan's hands, no privilege of any kind should be granted to the Japanese. Our contemporary adds, however, that these objections have no real value; that the charter will probably be obtained without much further delay, and that all the Foreign Representatives in Soul endorse Japan's claim.

Some of the Opposition journals are not at all satisfied to let the Kyobashi incident pass out of sight. They insist that it has disturbed the entente between the Liberals and the Progressists much more than either side is willing to acknowledge, and on the strength of that hypothesis they bitterly criticise the Constitutional Party for quarrelling over such trifles. The Tokyo Asahi, however, takes a more radical line. It maintains that the Progressist-Liberal alliance [illegible] have become reconciled to the idea of separation, and that each is prepared to step aside so soon as the superiority of the other's strength becomes clearly assured. But naturally they are both anxious to choose a convenient time and opportunity. If was because they anticipated a rupture that they did not cōoperate with each other in the elections, for each hoped that the returns would give it the command of the situation. The result was not sufficiently marked to be convenient to either, for although the Progressists gained considerably as compared with the Liberals, the preponderance was not by any means conclusive. Nevertheless, since the so called "Satsuma Section" have thrown in their lot with the Progressists, the latter believe that if their fellow thinkers among the "Independents" be reckoned, they can certainly command 150 votes in the Lower House. They farther claim that no such thing exists any longer as a united Liberal Party. The Kiushiu section, under Mr. Matsuda, they say, is by no means closely tié with the Itagaki section, and, in case of a rupture, would probably join the Constitutionalists, Count Okuma and Mr. Matsuda being from the same province (Hizen). Then there is the Tohoku coterie, under the leadership of Mr Kono Hironaka, who, being still much disliked and distrusted by the Liberals in general, is pretty sure to prefer the Progressist camp. Another uncertain element is the Kwanto section, under Mr. Hoshi Toru. It occupies neutral ground, and is just as likely to range itself finally under the Progressist banner as under the Liberal. Finally, the Hokushin and Chiugoku section are not particularly loyal to Count Itagaki, and it is therefore on the cards, taking all these things into consideration, that a little dexterous manipulation might drive Count Itagaki and Mr. Hayashi out of the Cabinet and leave them with the support of the Tosa section only. Such, according to the Asahi, is the view that the Progressists take of the situation. On the other hand, the Liberals say that they would certainly carry the National Unionists with them, and that if to these be added Baron Ito's followers and the new "Ten Club" of Azabu, together with a proportion of the "Independents," their total strength would fall little, if at all, short of that of the Progressists. Whichever estimate be correct, the Asahi alleges that if either side could find some great issue to take for a platform, it would at once break away from the coalition.

It is alleged by the Yomiuri Shimbun that means have been found to solve the question which at one time threatened to become acute, namely, the Cabinet's refusal to entertain the views formulated by the extraordinary Committee of the Party on the subject of administrative reform. Compromise is once more the order of the day; a certain number of the Party's recommendations are to be adopted and the remainder rejected. Our contemporary is not very explicit, but it says that among the accepted proposals are the abolition of Chokunin Councillors and of the Department of Justice, the present Minister of the latter, Mr. Ohigashi Gitetsu, being himself a party to the change.

The Jiji Shimpo maintains its exceedingly radical tone with reference to the reorganization of the Government's personnel. It says that the first duty before the Cabinet is to put its house into order, and that there is only way to accomplish that, namely, by weeding out about one half of the total number of officials and increasing the salaries of those that remain. All the talk about administrative reform strikes the Jiji as superfluous. Sweep out the useless officials, dissolve the administrative reform committee, and then go to work in earnest at the numerous problems awaiting a settlement.

Meanwhile the Nichi Nichi Shimbun declares that the Constitutional Party has no real strength whatever. It commands five-sixths of the votes in the Lower House, yet it does not seem able to accomplish anything. The bigger and bulkier it becomes, the more helpless does it show itself. Ever since it came into power, it has offered to the public only one spectacle, that of its own dissensions. There is much noise, much turmoil, but no tangible result.

* * *

The Tokyo Asahi lends its voice to swell this chorus of disapproval. It has a long article on "the science of government," the gist of which is that falsehood and braggadocio used to be very good weapons for old-time statesmen, but are out of fashion now-a-days. Then is goes on to declare that the present cabinet is no better than the last, that it can not continue long in power, and that the public hope to see it succeeded by a Ministry which will pay some attention to the modern principles of administration.

CONSULAR APPOINTMENTS AND CHANGES.

We learn, says the Kobe Chronicle, that Mr. A. E. Wileman, who had just returned from leave of absence in England, has been appointed Vice-Consul for Hyogo and Osaka, in place of Mr. F. W. Playfair, who has been appointed Consul to Hakodate. Owing to the absence of Mr. Hall on leave, Mr. Playfair who is now Acting Consul, will not leave for his new post before the 15th of next month. We also hear that Mr. R. de B. Layard will go to Tamsui, and that Mr. Bonar, who is now Consul at that port, may be appointed Consul at Yokohama. According to rumour, there is to be a change in the status of the various Consulates. At present Yokohama ranks first, but as soon as the new Treaties come into force and Her Majesty's Court for Japan is abolished, Yokohama being near to the Legation in Tokyo, there will be no necessity for the Consul, who now acts as Assistant-Judge, to be appointed because of his seniority and long experience. Therefore the Consulate for Hyogo and Osaka (Kobe) will rank first, as the largest British trade is done here. Nagasaki will rank second and Yokohama third. Presuming that the reports, which have been in circulation for a week or two past, are well founded, Mr. Hall will remain in Kobe and Mr. Longford at Nagasaki, and the next Consul in order for promotion (Mr. Bonar) will be appointed to Yokohama.

COUNT ITAGAKI'S ESSAY.

Count Itagaki has taken an unprecedented step. He has written a long essay, and published it over his own signature, in the columns of the Tokyo Shimbun. Of course, if it were an essay on theology or philosophy or anything of that kind, there would be nothing very remarkable in the performance. But it is an essay about the business of the State Department over which he presides, and as such it constitutes, we imagine, a totally new departure. At this moment of writing, only the first part of the essay is before us, and we may say at once that, unusual as is the publication of a series of comments on his own official business by a Cabinet Minister, Count Itagaki's method of treating the subject is not calculated to shock any sense of official propriety. Formosa and Hokkaido are first discussed. As to the former, we gather that certain plans of reform—they receive no exposition—are on the tapis, but that they are held in abeyance until the Governor-General has completed his thus-far-very-successful efforts to convert the insurgents into peaceful subjects. In Hokkaido, the chief aim is to obtain popular confidence for the Administration, but the methods contemplated for that purpose can not be spoken of in detail at present. Count Itagaki has a great deal to say about local Government. His remarks on the subject do not amount, however, to more than an exposition of general principles, most admirable in the abstract, but scarcely of sufficient interest to call for detailed translation. He further enunciates very enlightened and irreproachable ideas about the necessity of impartiality on the part of the police, and co-operation between Government and people, but these doctrines, too, are only what we expect from a leading Japanese statesman.

In the second article contributed by the Minister of Home Affairs to the Tokyo Shimbun, Count Itagaki sets out by speaking of prison reform. His views, however, are only a replica of the opinions expressed by him some time ago to a reporter of the same journal and translated at the time in these columns—namely, that the present provincial jail system is radically defective, since no proper means exist for separating prisoners according to the nature of their offences; that the prisons, instead of serving to diminish crime, assist to propagate it; that 50 per cent. of the criminal classes consist at present of recidivists; that efficient and intelligent men can not be induced to serve as wardens, since the emoluments are poor and the profession offers no prospect of promotion, and that uniformity in the prison system can not be secured without transferring the management of the jails from the communes to the central Government.

The Count then went on to speak of religion. His language showed that he has a very high opinion of the value of religion to a nation, for he described it as an essential and fundamental factor of social education. Laws already exist, he said, for the preservation of temples and shrines, but there are no proper regulations bearing on the management of the finances of these institutions, and [illegible] the Japanese capital. There was so system offered. The Tai-wŏn Kun demo-

Minister is now busying himself to supply the deficiency.

Having referred briefly to the control of rivers, a subject which has always presented great difficulties, his Excellency then spoke of local administration. His remarks on this topic will not sound very pleasant in the ears of the tax-payer, for they indicate a conviction that the appropriations on account of prefectural governments will have to be materially increased. The work has been growing heavier for some years, and the allowances are lighter. Thus, in the case of Kanagawa prefecture, the number of documents dealt with in 1888 was 100,000 and the allowances aggregated 20,000 yen; the documents in 1896 totalled 280,000, and the allowances were only 80,000 yen. New subjects for legislation are constantly presenting themselves, and new regulations have to be made to deal with them, all of which entails a steady increase of administrative work. Reference was also made to the necessity of improving the systems of hygiene and sanitation, and to the advisability of increasing the salaries of local officials.

We presume that these articles are designed as a reply to the thoughtless and impatient critics who imagine that because they do not get see any great and striking result achieved by a Cabinet which has not been quite two months in office, the Ministry must be absolutely idle. Count Itagaki and the Department over which he presides certainly have their hands full enough. In addition to the various projects enumerated above, Count Itagaki recently explained that he is vigorously investigating the following subjects, and that Bills bearing upon them will probably be introduced in the next session of the Diet:—First, the improvement of the police system and its development; secondly, the protection of the labouring classes—as to this, immediate legislation is not contemplated, but only tentative measures of administration—; thirdly, the relief of the poor, with special reference to hospitals and prison-gate assistance—this purpose also is not to be at once brought within the purview of legislation, but efforts will be made towards founding and endowing charity hospitals, places for providing employment, and societies for prison-gate aid; fourthly, the control of the social evil and the question of its centralization or distribution; and, fifthly, the amendment of the law of election as well as of that relating to roads. We have here a sufficiently formidable catalogue. It ought to take away the breath of the writers who accuse the Ministry of being unable to do anything more than keep the peace among their own followers and allay their office-seeking fever. But the hostile writers get out of the difficulty very simply by saying that statements like those of Count Itagaki are mere talk.

STORY OF A REMARKABLE MAN.

By degrees some real light is being thrown on the events of Korean history. What happened in Tokyo after the modern re-opening of Japan to foreign intercourse, is happening on a smaller and slower scale in Sŏul. We can not wonder that the difference should be all in favour of the malfeasant opportunity for fraud this much more to interest the public in Japan's records and in her national life, and there were so many more students available for the study, that the work of investigation went on rapidly and thoroughly. When we turn over the pages of blue books, periodicals, newspapers and proceedings of learned societies published between 1860 and 1880, we are struck by the remarkable diligence and insight of the numerous writers who, during that era, devoted themselves to examining and expounding Japan's history, politics, manners and customs. The great majority of them were Englishmen. Indeed, if the contributions made by members of the British Consular and Diplomatic services be excluded, the residuum is not very imposing. But in Korea's case the work is being done chiefly by Americans. America was closely connected with Japan's emergence from isolation, but England may be said to have formed the world's knowledge of Japan. Japan was the principal instrument in drawing Korea into the comity of nations, and now America is acting as Korea's interpreter.

Mr. G. H. Jones, in the last number of the Korean Repository, writes an obituary notice of Yi Ha-eung, Prince of Heung Sŏng, whom the foreign public knows as the Tai-wŏn Kun, or Prince Parent. The figure of this remarkable man dwarfs all its surroundings on the stage of modern Korea's existence. Born on January 22nd 1811, he died on February 22nd 1898, but during his long life of 87 years, the portion possessing vivid interest did not commence until 1863, when, at the age of 52, he succeeded in having his second son proclaimed King of Korea, and became himself the virtual, though not the nominal, regent of the Kingdom, wielding almost autocratic power for ten years until the King attained his majority, and the Queen's faction, the Min, succeeded in depriving the Tai-wŏn Kun of all authority. He did not accept his effacement tamely. Our of his first protests took the form of an infernal machine. The Queen's brother, Seung-ho, had become the royal favourite. One day, when he was offering sacrifices to the spirits of his ancestors, a box arrived. It was supposed to have come from the palace. Seung-ho, his mother and his son hastened to open it and were blown into the other world. In Japan the Tai-wŏn Kun is not credited with having taken the initiative in that kind of civility. It is said that he himself had previously received from the Mins a box of cigars with dynamite mouth-pieces. But neither these incidents nor the subsequent struggle of the fierce old autocrat, ending in his own kidnapping by the Viceroy Li's agents and his five years' exile in China, are as interesting as the measures of domestic policy that he adopted during his tenure of power. He was undoubtedly a reformer of the most radical type. The status of the aristocrat had been determined from time immemorial in Korea by means of ancestral tablets. There was the tablet erected in memory of a deceased philosopher or teacher by his disciples, and there was the tablet officially placed in one of the provincial temples of fame as a reward for meritorious public services. All the descendants of the men whose names were thus enshrined, enjoyed special privileges. They constituted the Yangban class. It is easy to see what lished all the "temples of fame" and destroyed their tablets. He must have wielded enormous power. One can scarcely conceive the possibility of carrying out such a measure without provoking a national insurrection. Then the Tai-wŏn Kun abolished the military tax and substituted a house-tax in its place. The military tax had been levied on the plebeians only. It "subjected them to all sorts of disabilities and reduced them to virtual serfdom." But the house-tax was leviable upon patrician and plebeian alike; upon Yangban and coolie. This was, in effect, a wholesale levelling of class distinctions and class privileges. From these sweeping steps the Tai-wŏn Kun passed to sumptuary regulations. He allowed the common people to wear black shoes, a privilege hitherto restricted to the aristocracy; he reduced the immense sleeves worn by the "gentleman-at-large" section of the population, and cut down the dimensions of the hat, which was then some four feet in diameter. The sumptuary changes are worth nothing. It has been charged repeatedly against the Japanese that they prompted, or rather compelled, the Korean Government in 1894 to interdict the wearing of top-knot and the use of long pipes, and that by such meddling they helped to provoke popular discontent. The Japanese have always denied the charge, and have declared that these interferences with national customs, however desirable their purpose, were not even encouraged by the Japanese Representative in Sŏul. The Tai-wŏn Kun's record shows, at all events, that the idea of such reforms did not come from without.

From Mr. Jones' essay we derive a new conception of the Tonghaks. He describes them as a religious sect. They claimed to be endowed with supernatural powers by the god whom they worshipped, and they are described in the annals as "deluding the common folk and deceiving the world." They appear, so far as we can gather, to have had their origin in 1872. The Tai-wŏn Kun suppressed them; not completely, indeed, for they re-appeared upon the stage 21 years later and were the proximate cause of the war between China and Japan. Mr. Jones' speaks of the suppression of the Tonghaks as "preliminary to the anti-foreign, anti-christian policy" subsequently adopted by the Tai-wŏn Kun, but does not attempt to trace the connexion. It is to be desired that he had been less reticent.

The sentiment suggested by Mr. Jones' brief but interesting essay is one of hope for Korea. It is a common saying that she has lost the capacity to produce a really strong man, and that any attempt to inaugurate radical sweeping reforms would only serve to foment faction feuds and probably promote foreign interference. The story of the Tai-wŏn Kun's life proves indisputably that these conclusions are both erroneous. He was a man strong enough for any crisis, and the success of his wholesale methods indicates that a reforming statesman in Korea needs only courage. The Japanese showed wise insight when they endeavoured to utilize his services in 1894.

The German steamer Donar, on arrival at Saigon from Hongkong, was placed under arrest, French Customs officers having discovered six hundred taels of contraband opium on board, supposed to have been secreted by Chinese before the vessel left Hongkong.

JAPAN'S MARITIME FACILITIES.

During the war with China, the number of steamers belonging to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha which were employed in connection with the transport of troops was 66 and their total displacement 160,000 tons. They carried, in all, 814,000 men and 1889 horses; made 716 voyages, and traversed 1,323,200 nautical miles. Adding the steamers obtained from other sources, the Government's fleet of transports aggregated 176, with a total displacement of 216,160 tons. Those figures are taken from the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. It is added that at the beginning of the war the tonnage of all the steamers in Japan's possession was only 180,000 tons, that very few of these vessels were over 1,000 tons. More than 60, with a displacement of 150,000 tons, had to be bought, and 100 were chartered, their total displacement being 203,000 tons. Hence it appears that 350,000 tons of steam shipping had to be added to the country's mercantile marine. The figures are very suggestive. They add much force to the argument often put forward in these columns, namely, that in doubling the establishment of her army, Japan is supplying herself with a weapon which she will not have strength to wield advantageously unless she adopts more vigorous methods of developing her mercantile marine. The framers of the post-bellum programme evidently appreciated that a big army is of no service unless means of transporting it exist. For that reason they introduced laws to encourage navigation and ship-building. But the laws have been administered in such a fashion as to become almost a dead letter. We can not but endorse the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's criticism that a more liberal policy should be adopted. The country will have to make up its mind to extend a larger measure of aid to great shipping companies like the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, whose fleet of steamers is just as important to the State for fighting purposes as is the army itself. Our contemporary specially alludes to a fact which we find difficulty in crediting, namely, that the Government does not even appreciate the expediency of giving the State's carrying business to ships flying the national flag.

A ROMANTIC EPISODE.

The escapes effected by imperial and royal personages in times of insurrection have furnished sensational materials to many writers. Some of the strangest of these incidents could doubtless be furnished by Eastern annals, but that source receives little attention. What could be more romantic, for example, than the flight of the Queen of Korea from the palace on the night of July 23rd, 1882? One of her servants, Hong Chai-heui, took her on his back and made his way through the crowds in the streets. "He was stopped several times," says Mr. Jones, writing in the Korean Repository, "but, representing the lady as his sister, passed safely all obstructions and delivered her into the hands of her friends at the house of Yun Tai-chun." That was the occasion when her Majesty was supposed to have been assassinated, and the nation went into mourning for several months. In reality she was lying hidden in Chung Ju, until her appeal to China procured the intervention of Li Hung-chang, and the exile of her inveterate enemy, the Tai-wŏn Kun.

A CURIOUS POINT.

H. E. Mr. Ozaki Yukio, in the course of the capital speech delivered by him on the 21st instant at a réunion of the Educational Society—a speech to which we have already alluded at some length—made use of a singular phrase, according to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's report. Referring to the baleful effects of the worship of money, he said that, even though Japan became a republic—which, of course, was out of the question—, it would be impossible to have a firmly established Government were the influence of money paramount. The statement struck us at the time as so peculiar that we doubted the correctness of the report and refrained from any reference to the matter, for though a speech implying approval of a republican form of government might not sound strange in the ears of some Occidental audiences, it certainly does sound strange in Japan. Subsequently the authorities of the Educational Society wrote to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun to say that there was "no truth whatever in the statement," which contradiction was afterwards replaced by an assurance that the purport of what the Minister said had been misunderstood. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, however, refuses to accept the correction and dwells with not very dignified insistence on the point that the representations of the Educational Society can not both be accurate. Our contemporary insists, also, that the words were used and that everybody heard them. The question strikes us as being very insignificant. If Mr. Ozaki considers that the words reported by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun convey a false impression of what he intended to say, surely there need be no further discussion about the matter. At the same time it is interesting from a foreign point of view to note how completely any suggestion of a republican form of government in this country is tabooed by public opinion.

RAILWAYS.

Major Osawa, who recently made two trips to Europe for the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the question of the State ownership of railways, has brought back with him a firm conviction that private ownership is altogether a mistake. In a lecture recently delivered at the Department of Communications, he is said to have blamed his countrymen for judging only by results. They hear that State ownership does not succeed in France, for example, and they immediately jump to the conclusion that the principle of official railways is bad; or they learn that private lines answer all purposes in England, and they become persuaded that private ownership is the better system, without pausing to examine the conditions that exist in France and England. His inquiries have showed him plainly that all western countries are gradually tending to pronounce in favour of State ownership. He spoke also of gauges, and assured his audience that the superiority of the wide gauge was by no means established, and that, on the contrary, the balance of opinion seemed to be now swaying in the direction of the narrow gauge. Everything seems to indicate that the railway question is destined soon to occupy a large place in the thoughts of the Japanese nation.

THE RAILWAY QUESTION.

The vernacular press is now divided into two very clearly marked camps with reference to the problem of State ownership of railways. The occupants of each camp profess to be influenced solely by the pros and cons of the question itself from the point of view of concrete expediency, but, unfortunately for the validity of that claim, the lines of division coincide exactly with those of party politics. The Jiji Shimpo and all the journals regarded as organs of the Progressists vehemently oppose the idea of State purchase, whereas the journals representing the Liberal Party advocate that measure with an equal display of conviction. Briefly speaking, the contention of the former is that the agitation in favour of State ownership is inspired and supported by speculators in shares. They allege that the question has always been subserved to such influences. In 1890, for example, when a mania for speculation in shares was followed by something like a panic and by a heavy fall in the market prices of all securities, a cry was raised that the only exit from the situation would be found in the purchase of private railways by the State. A few years later, however, when the war with China gave a strenuous impetus to enterprise of every kind, and when railways were projected by the score, people talked of the expediency of transferring the Tokaido Railway to private ownership. And now, when the want of floating capital is keenly felt, once more the doctrine of State ownership finds numerous advocates. In short, the opponents of the scheme write as though its public advantages or disadvantages had no weight whatever with its supporters. They add that, in view of the difficulty experienced by the Government in selling the Public Undertakings and Railway Bonds which have to be disposed of in the ordinary routine of finance, it is extravagant to think of the State's becoming a purchaser of railways. The Jiji Shimpo, which condemns the project in unmeasured terms, will not even listen to the strategical reasons advanced by military men, for it asserts that if such arguments be valid in the case of railways, they ought to apply with equal force to steamships and coal mines. It must be confessed, however, that the Jiji and its allies do not appear to stand on very solid ground. Not one of them has seriously discussed the questions whether Japan, without recourse to foreign aid, can provide capital to complete her railway system, and whether, even if she could, she would be wise to make the effort. We find difficulty in perceiving how she is to continue the work of railway construction unless she relaxes some of the capital already fixed in that class of enterprise, and apparently the railway companies are powerless to effect the operation of release unless the Government assists them. Not many foreign observers will be disposed to conclude that the present management of state railways in Japan might be extended with advantage to a wider range of lines. That, however, is a mere question of technical and organizing competence. It does not affect the problem of public ownership from the economical point of view, which is really the only important point of view for Japan at the present moment.

AN ANNIVERSARY EXHIBITION.

The year 1899 will be the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of modern Japan to foreign intercourse. In order to celebrate the occasion, it is proposed to have an exhibition in Tokyo. Under any circumstances, if the rule of a domestic exhibition every fourth year be observed, 1899 would be the proper time for an enterprise of that kind, the last having been held in Kyoto in 1895. It is just possible, however, that as the attention of Japanese artists and artizans will be engrossed in preparations for the French international exhibition of 1900, the Government would have considered it expedient to postpone the domestic exhibition of 1899 had not this question of the 50th anniversary of the country's opening presented itself. We do not know that anything definite has yet been decided, but we note a suggestion in one of the leading vernacular journals that the exhibition should be opened to the products of all the countries washed by the Pacific Ocean. It seems to us altogether too late to organize an exhibition on such a scale. Indeed, we can scarcely persuade ourselves to believe that the project of holding one of the quadrennial exhibitions next year is seriously contemplated. April, or May at latest, is the month always selected for such affairs, which means that only seven, or at most eight months now remain, an interval quite insufficient for purposes of preparation.

THE PERRY EPISODE.

The Japanese, as we have often observed, love a joke. It was not to be supposed that they would fail to appreciate the comical side of the entertainment given to Professor Perry under the auspices of the Welcome Society. To fête a man who, from his entertainers' point of view, has done nothing whatever to deserve the honour, and to get up a public entertainment on his account merely because he happens to be the grand-nephew of his grand-uncle, is carrying the principle of vicarious recognition almost as far as it is carried for pension purposes in the United States. Accordingly, some folks whose phrenological furniture does not include the bump of reverence declined to apply the classic term Kangeikai to the Perry function, and spoke of it in preference as the Perori-Kai—a word which, while it serves, on the one hand, as a transliteration of "Perry-Kai," has the additional meaning of a "voracious party." It was an amusing impromptu. People laughed a little, and then the affair passed out of memory. It had a graceful side and perhaps also a useful side, so that no one was disposed to ridicule it over-much. But the laughter has now been revived in a manner that is mischievous rather than mirthful. The Yomiuri Shimbun and the Nippon state that Professor Perry is an impostor; that his supposed relationship to Commodore Perry is all moonshine; that he prudently took his departure from Japan on the 19th instant in the Empress of China; and that, in short, he absconded. The tale is utterly untrue, Professor Perry is still in Japan, at Nikko, we believe. The story gives the newspapers an opportunity to make merry at the expense of Mr. Fukuzawa, at whose College Professor Perry was employed, and at the expense of Marquis Hachisuka, the President of the Welcome Society.

THE COMMERCIAL AND MANUFACTURING CLASSES IN POLITICS.

One of the projects of the last Cabinet was to redress the great inequality now existing between the influence of the agricultural interest in politics and the interest of the commercial and manufacturing classes. The land-owners command nine-tenths of the votes in the Lower House of the Diet, and it is chiefly for that reason that an increase of the Land Tax fails to obtain Parliamentary sanction. The Government, in order to correct that state of affairs, proposed to give a greater number of representatives to the cities and the urban districts, and a change in that sense was embodied in the revised Law of Elections, presented to the last Diet. But the Lower House, not unnaturally, cut down the scheme so that no appreciable re-adjustment would have been effected by it. Marquis Ito declared that the Government would never sanction the law in its mutilated form, but before it became necessary to put that resolve to the test, the House of Representatives was dissolved. The section of the population engaged in commerce and manufacture numbers 9¾ millions, and possesses certainly one half of the nation's total wealth. Yet its influence is scarcely felt in politics. The little band of politicians known as the "business men" (jitsugyo-ka) acquire a factitious importance from the numerical equality of the two great parties, and the consequent power of any band of outsiders to sway the balance in either direction. But it is certainly a very remarkable feature of Japanese politics that the manufacturing and mercantile classes allow themselves to be almost completely effaced by the agricultural—remarkable especially when we remember that, whatever may have been the case in former times, Japan's future is now plainly seen to depend on the development of her trade and manufacture. We observe with satisfaction that some influential vernacular journals are taking up this question, and endeavouring to rouse the country's merchants and industrials to a sense of the mischief attending their present perfunctory attitude towards politics.

"LE NU AU SALON."

It is probable that considerable interest will be aroused by the action of the Home Minister, Count Itagaki, in forbidding the sale in Japan of Armand Silvestre's Le Nu au Salon. The peoples of the Occident have always been in the habit of sitting in solemn judgment on the peoples of the Orient in matters of morality, and it is a distinctly disagreeable slap in the face that a book allowed to be freely sold in Europe should be tabooed by the Japanese as prejudicial to moral health. For our own part, however, we have not the slightest hesitation in endorsing Count Itagaki's judgment. It is all very well to pretend, as some critics are in the habit of pretending, that the objectionable features of pictures of the nude are purely subjective. That is a remarkably clever argument. It silences cavil by constructively convicting the caviller of moral obliquity. "To the pure all things are pure. A prude who applies the epithet unclean to anything sanctioned by art merely exposes his own moral uncleanliness." Veritable despotism of discussion, that. Not one among us can frankly assert that a book like Le Nu au Salon is without demoralizing influence. Many of the pictures are beautiful, very beautiful, and a few, a very few, show the wonderful power that a really great artist possesses of subordinating the sensuous to the graceful, and suggesting the refinement of love rather than the coarseness of lust. But not a single one of them is absolutely beyond ethical criticism, and, in truth, if M. Armand Silvestre had deliberately set himself to expose the evil features of this kind of pictorial art, he could not have succeeded better than by massing together a number of drawings which, when viewed separately, might pass muster as a mere glimpse of the "naughty," but when grouped in phalanx become obstrusively shocking and demoralizing. It is not a mere question of the nude: it is a question of motives also. Many of the motives of these pictures could not be verbally described without outraging the commonest canons of propriety. The Japanese are at the parting of the ways. They have to choose the route they will adopt, and we think that Count Itagaki is choosing the right route. It will be said, no doubt, that since the reality of the nude does not shock the Japanese, they can not consistently object to its pictorial representation. An argument of that nature hardly deserves serious consideration. The Japanese have not hitherto condemned the nude under circumstances of expediency or necessity. They have not carefully secluded women's bathing places from men's—sometimes they do not separate them at all—, nor have they required that a labourer in hot weather should encumber himself with garments. Unquestionably in this matter they have often allowed liberty to lapse into licence. But the principle of their procedure is purely utilitarian. There has never been any exposure of the nude for the sake of the nude. That is the fundamental difference between the sacrifice of modesty that the Japanese make to convenience, and the sacrifice of morality that Western pictures of the nude make to the sensuously attractive. In the one case the nude is seen but not looked at; in the other, it is put forward expressly to be looked at. This feature of Western art has become extravagantly prominent. Of course the general question whether the nude should be banished altogether from the atelier and the salon is outside the range of this particular discussion. We have to do with a special publication, and since it certainly is not a publication that would be permitted to circulate as an original picture-album, we fail to see why its sale should be sanctioned because it is a collection of copies.

THE FUTURE OF THE PHILIPPINES AND CUBA.

Recent contributions in the London magazines from the pens of writers evidently familiar with their subject, give some valuable information about the question now so much discussed and so important, namely, the capacities of the inhabitants of Cuba and the Philippines to be autonomic. Mr. G. C. Musgrave, in the Contemporary Review, after a brief but highly suggestive reference to the large material results that might be obtained by intelligent development of Cuba's splendid resources, makes the following recommendation about the future of the island:—

Annexation would hardly be consistent with the protestations of humanity only with which America answers those critics who charge her with land-grabbing, or with her disinterested attitude in the past, when she nobly tried to feed the reconcentrados without coming between Spain and the insurgents, and found it impossible to assist a tithe of the needy while the struggle continued. The Cubans in arms are also opposed to annexation, and, indeed, would bitterly fight against it. Independence under the immediate protection of the United States will assuredly be the wisest policy, while the influx of British and American capital, the opening up of rich interior districts, and the removal of certain prescriptive tariffs, which the Cubans will insist upon, will speedily assure a return of prosperity to the Pearl of the Antilles when secure a government is established.

That the Cubans will form an ideal government I do not say; but that the island will be better governed than other Spanish-American Republics is a foregone conclusion. The negro problem is not a difficult one. The proportion of the coloured element is much less than in the Southern States, and the Cuban negroes for the most part are an ignorant, indolent, happy-go-lucky race, not eleven years freed from slavery, and still greatly influenced by their former owners. The white Cuban of the small farming class is entirely uneducated, but hospitable, honest, and frugal. In the scattered districts of the interior education has been beyond his reach. But it is in the planter class, the once wealthy sugar and tobacco growers, that the hope of Cuba lies. Lacking educational facilities in the island for many years past, those who could afford it sent their children to the United States schools and colleges. Here they have drunk in Anglo-Saxon ideals, and, though bred at home in luxury and indolence, the war has taught them lessons that will be invaluable in the future. The Cuban is no longer a Spaniard. Reared under entirely different conditions, and its blood recruited by refugees from the French Revolution, by Americans, and by sons of Jamaican planters, chiefly of Scotch descent, who have settled and intermarried with the colonists, a new race has arisen, more refined and cultured, and perhaps more effeminate, than the swarthy bull-fighting sons of Spain, who swarm to Cuba for a season and retire to the Peninsula after a few years' toil. These Cubans have directed this struggle either actively or by secret help from the outside. Those in the cities formed the autonomy government under General Blanco, not because it was the realisation of their ideals, but to secure the gain of half measures in case of failure to accomplish more, and were it politic to do so I could give abundant proof of aid furnished to the revolution by prominent autonomists both before and since the decrees were instituted. I have mixed freely with the peaceful Cubans of all classes, and, though many deplore the revolution and its effects, they are unanimously in favour of freedom from Spain's brutal yoke in any shape or form. Under the direction of the United States it will not be the insurgents who will govern the island, but representatives elected by the voice of the Cuban people, and there are men of intelligence in plenty to fill the posts.

With regard to the resources of the Philippines, Mr. John Foreman, writing in the same Review, gives this most hopeful summary:—

The total population of the islands amounts to about six millions. The chief products are hemp, sugar, leaf tobacco, and cigars. The articles of minor importance for export are choice hardwoods, dyewoods, copra, rattans, palm-leaf hats, gums, &c. The islands are extremely fertile, and will produce almost anything to be found in the tropics. I estimate that barely one fourth of the tillable land is now under cultivation. There is at present only one railway of 120 miles. A number of lines would have to be constructed in Luzon, Panay, Negros, Cebu, and Mindanao Islands. Companies would probably take up the contracts on ninety-years' working concession and ninety-nine years' lease of acreage in lieu of guaranteed interest. The lands would become immensely valuable to the railway companies, and an enormous source of taxable wealth to the Protectorate. Road-making should be taken upon Treasury account, and bridge construction on contract, to be paid for by toll concessions. The port of Yloilo should be improved, the custom houses abolished, and about ten more free ports opened to the world. Under the Protectorate undoubtedly capital would flow into the Philippines. The coal beds in Luzon and Cebu Islands would be opened out; the marble deposits of Montalban and the stone quarries of Angono (both near Manila) would surely be worked. The possibilities of development under a free, liberal government are so great that the next generation would look back with astonishment at the statistics of the present day. The Chamber of Deputies would no doubt adopt measures to avert the danger of an overwhelming influx of Chinese.

As to the government of the islands after the withdrawal of Spanish authority, Mr. Foreman's views are very explicit:—

General Aguinaldo's plan, I am informed, is to establish at Manila a Congress to which deputies from all the principal islands will be invited. I do not hesitate to prophesy that, unless under European or American control, the scheme will end in complete failure. At first, no doubt, the islanders will welcome and co-operate in any arrangement which will rid them of monastic oppression. The Philippine Islands, however, would not remain one year a peaceful united Archipelago under an independent native Government. It is an utter impossibility. There is such racial antipathy that the Visayas would not, in this generation, submit to what they would always consider a Tagálog Republic, and the Tagálogs, having procured the overthrow of the Spaniards, would naturally resent a preponderance of Visaya influence. Families there are very closely united, but as a people they have little idea of union. The rivalry for prestige at the present day between one village and another on the same coast is sufficient to prove the tendency to disintegrate. The native likes to localise, to bring everything he requires or aspires to within his own small circle. If his ambition were to be a leader of men he would be content to be a king in his own town. Native ideas are not expansive and far-reaching. Then the question arises—who would be the electors? The masses are decidedly too ignorant to be capable of voting intelligently. The votes would be entirely controlled by cliques of landowners.

If the native Republic did succeed, it would not be strong enough to protect itself against foreign aggression. The islands are a splendid group, well worth picking a quarrel and spending a few millions sterling to annex them. I entertain the firm conviction that an unprotected united Republic would last only until the novelty of the situation had worn off. Then, I think, every principal island would, in turn, declare its independence. Finally, there would be complete chaos, and before that took root America, or some European nation, would probably have interfered. Therefore it is better to start with protection. I cannot doubt that General Aguinaldo is quite alive to these facts; nevertheless, I admire his astuteness in entering on any plan which, by hook or by crook, will expel the friars. If the Republic failed, at least monastic power would never return.

Finally, we may quote the opinion expressed by Miss L. W. I. Garnett in the Fortnightly Review:—"The better educated among the half-breeds and Creoles aspire to becoming reformers of their country's institutions; and, even previously to the late revolts, a certain number have been imprudent enough to give proof of the desire entertained by many to overthrow Spanish rule in the islands, and establish instead a Philippine Republic. But even in the exceedingly unlikely event of such a termination to the present rebellion, the new state of things could only be of very short duration. It is, I believe, an ascertained fact that the increase of energy introduced into the Philippine native by European blood lasts only to the second generation; and left to himself the tendency of the mestizo is ever to revert to the natural type. The native is too indolent, and the hold of civilization upon him is too slight, ever to make anything higher than municipal self-government possible in these islands."

A sensational find is reported from Kanowa, in the West Australian gold fields. There, about the middle of last month, miners found a nugget of gold weighing over 95 pounds. It is about 15in. long, and 5in. thick at its deepest point, and is almost of pure gold. At both ends there is oxidised iron, and the nugget resembles pickled fish in shapes.

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP COMPETITION.

Keen competition appears to have sprung up between the Sanyo Railway Company and the Steamship Union. The former recently extended its line from Mitajiri to Tokuyama, and, its cars being incomparably the best appointed in Japan, as its service is the best organized, it soon began to attract numbers of passengers and quantities of freight for Kiushu. The steamship folk, in order to check this diversion of their traffic, saw nothing better than to raise the charges for passage by their connecting steamers between Tokuyama and Moji. That was the first note of battle. The Sanyo Railway Company lost no time in starting a service of steamers of their own to make the connexion across the straits. They also established a spacious and commodious waiting room at Moji, and organized a corps of fifty red-capped runners to capture passengers and goods. The Steamship Union met this move by sending out eighty white-capped touts, and reducing the fares by its steamers from Kobe to Moji. A battle of rates has therefore been commenced, and persons travelling or sending goods southward from Kobe are likely to have a good time.

We mention above the competition that had been commenced between the Sanyo Railway Company and the Steam-ship Union. The former's line is now open from Kobe to Mitajiri, and at the latter place connexion is effected with steamers belonging to the company which carry passengers and goods across the strait to Moji. As for the Union steamers, they run direct from Osaka and Kobe to Moji. The latest detailed news we had was that the Railway Company had commenced to carry passengers from Kobe to Moji for 1.70 yen per head—third class, of course. A curious feature of the rates fixed by the Company was that whereas a ticket from Kobe to Mitajiri cost 1.95 yen, the through charge to Moji was only 1.70 yen. In other words, not only was the steamship journey from Mitajiri to Moji free of charge, but a premium of 26 sen was given for making the trip. The telegraph now informs us that the Steamship Union have cut down their charges so that a third-class passage from Kobe to Moji costs only 1 yen, or 70 sen less than the fare by railway. The competitors will soon be without any margin to work upon if they continue in this heroic course.

THE AMERICANS AND THE REBELS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

One of the reasons assigned for postponing the final decision as to the fate of the Philippines is that the Government in Washington has no definite information as to the agreement, if any, existing between Admiral Dewey and the insurgents. Mr. John Foreman, however, writing in the Contemporary Review, speaks with an appearance of absolute certainty on this. "In April last," he says, "General Aguinaldo concluded a secret agreement with Admiral Dewey, subject to ratification by the United States Government. * * * It is provisionally agreed that Aguinaldo shall set up a republic (of which [illegible] Aguinaldo's plan, I am informed, is to establish at Manila a Congress to which deputies from all the principal islands will be invited." If that be true, it is evidently want not of knowledge but of bases for a determination that makes the Washington Government hesitate. Admiral Dewey's compact with Aguinaldo, being explicitly subject to approval in Washington, has no binding effect on the United States, but it indicates the existence of an aspiration which may complicate the situation.

TWO-HUNDRED-AND TENTH DAY.

On Thursday, September 1st, was the nihyaku-tōka—210th day—, to which Japanese farmers look forward with so much anxiety. The theory is that if the nihyaku-tōka passes without a storm of wind and rain, the success of the rice crop is virtually assured—other conditions, of course, being favourable—inasmuch as the transition from flower to ear will then have been effected. Many people suppose that there is a question of one day only. But that, we need scarcely say, is not the case. The nihyaku-tōka marks the close of the total period of special susceptibility to climatic influences: that is all. A typhoon might sweep over the country on the 210th day, and yet a large part of the crop might escape without serious damage. In point of fact a nihyaku-tōka without a storm, great or small, is a very rare occurrence in Japan. On the whole, the country has been very fortunate this season, for though the extreme south of the island seems to have been visited by some heavy weather about the 30th ultimo, the damage, if any, has been apparently of very limited character.

According to local telegrams, heavy rains and winds were experienced in some localities, but on the whole the weather was fair. The telegrams report that the rice fields are not damaged. The market has a downward tendency. Information concerning the weather at the principal cities is as follows:—Sapporo—Fair, thermometer 78 degrees. Sendai—Rain commenced at 7.30 a.m. and ceased at 9 a.m. Maebashi—Cloudy with east wind; threatening. Naoetsu—Cloudy and somewhat cool. Shizuoka—Heavy rains, thermometer 80 degrees. Nagoya—heavy rains, ceasing at 9 a.m. Tsu—Threatening aspect; storm ceased at 10 a.m. Gifu—Heavy rain and rivers overflowed. Osaka—At about 3 a.m. strong winds commenced, but the weather calmed by 5 a.m. Kobe—Slight rains continued the whole day. Hiroshima—Fair, and rice crops are expected very good. Matsuyama—Fair. Kumamoto—Cloudy Kagoshima—Rain, with 84 degrees of heat.

THE WEATHER

On the 28th ultimo the experts of the Central Observatory published notices that a low barometric pressure had been reported in the north of Formosa on the 20th, and that it gave indications of extending to Japan five days subsequently. Indeed, on the 26th ultimo, the central and western districts of Kiushiu experienced heavy weather. The depression travelled, however, in the direction of Korea, and then seems to have turned southward, passing viâ the Rinkiu islands towards the Formosan Channel. Possibly [illegible] that was the storm which ultimately reached Formosa on the 28th ultimo, and caused serious shipping disaster at Tamsui with a loss of 170 lives.

Altogether, the weather has been unsettled for some days past. On the 27th ultimo, the barometer in Tokyo rose to 165 m.m., a very exceptional reading, which, at this time of year, usually preludes a storm. On the 30th ultimo, a depression was telegraphed from Riukiu, and a strong wind blew at Ishigaki Island and at Osumi in Kiushiu. On the afternoon of that day, the centre of depression moved to the north-east, and Miyazaki (near Kagoshima) was visited by a storm of wind and rain. The Meteorological Authorities issued a warning on the 31st ultimo, first to the districts on the west coast, and subsequently to those on the east. The centre of depression was then said to be advancing to the north east, but the indications were not of a specially alarming nature.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORALITY IN JAPAN.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—In the Monthly Summary of the Religious Press, published in the Weekly Mail of July 9th, I find the following paragraph:—"The Shin Seiki has an article by the editor, Mr. Kozaki Hiromichi, on 'Morality in Japan' in which reference is made to an address of Dr. Greene's in Boston, on 'Great Questions in Japan.' These were stated to be three—(1) Independence; (2) The Army and Navy; (3) Morality. Mr. Kozaki observes that the first two questions were discussed very fully by Dr. Greene, but that the third, in Mr. Kozaki's opinion by far the most important, was not treated in a full and satisfactory manner."

With regard to this paragraph, let me say that I think Mr. Kozaki must have been misled by a very imperfect report in a Boston paper, which I myself have only been able to explain upon the theory that the reporter did not hear the latter half of my address. The subject of the address as stated by myself was:—"Problems of the immediate future in Japan." The problems which I attempted to discuss were those of—(1) National Independence; (2) Military and Naval expansion; Commercial and Industrial Success; (4) Morality; (5) Religion. It was not my purpose to treat any of these questions fully, but simply to state them and to show how in my judgment the religious problem lay back of all the others. So far as I could judge from the comments of many of my auditors made to myself at the close of my address, I succeeded in making the impression I designed to make, and I feel quite sure that my friend, Mr. Kozaki, would have given his cordial assent to all that I said, though doubtless he would have thought, as I did myself, that it was but a mere outline of a subject worthy of a full and extended treatment; but this was inevitable in view of the brief time allotted me!

Yours, &c., D. C. GREENE.

EMPEROR TO VISIT YOKOSUKA.

It is stated that His Majesty will proceed to Yokosuka about the middle of this month to visit the warships Fuji, Yashima Takasago, and Numa anchoring there. Some military attachés have been sent to the port to make preparations.

Captain Inman Sealby's reward for conveying the news of the annexation of Hawaii to Honolulu was a handsome silver cup, presented by a committee of One Hundred. The genial captain of the Coptic deserved this recognition.

THE FAR-EASTERN QUESTION.

MR. R. S. YORKE, writing in the Fortnightly Review on "Wei-hai-wei, Our Latest Leasehold Possession," refers to the evacuation of Port Hamilton in 1886, and says:—"The Chinese (and no doubt the Koreans and Japanese also) put our retirement down to weakness and fear of Russia alone." That is one of a very common class of statements which help to create among Englishmen unacquainted with the facts and conditions, a totally false impression of the results of British statesmanship and of the quality of British prestige in the Far East. Mr. YORKE admits that the assurances obtained from Russia by Her Majesty's Government at the time of the evacuation fully justified us in our own eyes, but he evidently thinks that neither the Chinese, nor the Japanese, nor the Koreans were capable of understanding our motives, and that, judging, as uncivilized nations usually do judge, from salient facts alone and in accordance with the lowest canons of morality, they construed our retreat simply as an evidence of weakness and pusillanimity. Of course we do not venture to interpret the sentiments felt by the Chinese or the Koreans on that occasion, but we can speak with confidence about the ideas of Japanese, and we assure the writer of the essay in the Fortnightly Review that there did not exist in Japan the most shadowy suspicion of the kind indicated by him. The Japanese Government, whatever be the measure of intelligence with which they are credited by MR. YORKE, had an intimate knowledge of all the incidents and negotiations relating to Port Hamilton. They knew perfectly well that neither weakness nor fear of Russia had anything whatever to do with the evacuation. "Fear of Russia" is, indeed, a comical suggestion. It might, perhaps, have been said—if such an insulting form of expression be permissible under any circumstances—that "fear of Russia" induced England to occupy Port Hamilton, since the measure was dictated by the imminence of war with that Power. But evacuation was another and a totally different matter. Considering that Russia made no protest of any kind, and that the place was not abandoned until long after the war clouds had blown over, it is surely extravagant to pretend that "fear of Russia" had anything to do with the step. The plain fact is that Port Hamilton, though strategically its value is beyond question, was found, after careful examination, to be topographically unsuited for the purposes of a naval station, and since the necessity for a basis in the neighbourhood of Korea had ceased to be imperative, England decided to abandon the place without occupying any other in its stead. We may add that, so far from its being true that the Chinese ascribed the abandonment to "fear of Russia," the statesmen in Peking must have known, beyond the possibility of misapprehension, that if any concession to a third Power was made in the evacuation, China herself was the Power. She it was that approached Great Britain on the subject, and she it was that obtained from Russia such a guarantee about the independence of Korea as seemed satisfactory in English eyes. The same inaccuracy—inaccuracy productive of grave misconceptions where subjects requiring the closest scrutiny are discussed—marks Mr. YORKE'S statements in other directions also. Thus he evidently believes that the British Government "offered a loan on extremely advantageous terms" to China, and that the latter was "most unwillingly induced" to refuse it owing to pressure exerted by Russia. But the truth is, as our readers are well aware, that Great Britain made no such offer. China applied to England for a loan and was informed of the terms on which it would be granted. She did not herself object to the terms, but she found that they would involve her in difficulties with the St. Petersburg Government, and she therefore decided not to proceed with the transaction. There is a substantial difference between the two versions. Then, again, Mr. YORKE asks us to draw an "obvious inference" from the facts that although Japan was turned out of Port Arthur, since her occupation of it would have been a constant menace to Peking, she was permitted to continue her occupation of Wei-hai-wei; the inference being that no comparison was thought possible between the strategical value of the two places as bases of operations against China. But he loses sight of two essential points; the first, that it was the flimsiest of pretexts to pretend that Japan's presence in Liaotung would be a menace to Peking, the real reason being that Russia desired to keep the peninsula free for her own occupation at a convenient time; the second, that Great Britain wants Wei-hai-wei not as a basis of operations against China, but as a means of crippling the power which Russia's possession of Port Arthur would otherwise confer on her. There is little significance in the talk about the nature of the hinterland of Wei-hai-wei; about the difficulty of defending it on the land side; about the cost of dredging the harbour and building docks. England is not concerned, for the present at any rate, about the contingency of attack from the land side, nor need the question of cost deter her. As for the quality of the harbour, there is only one thing to be said, namely, that it is the finest naval anchorage in the north of China. But, as we have said, these are secondary conditions. The prime purpose of Wei-hai-wei's occupation is to restore the balance of power which Russia's acquisition of Port Arthur disturbed, and the indisputable fact is that so long as England, with her greatly preponderating maritime strength, holds Wei-hai-wei, Port Arthur will be comparatively useless to Russia as a naval station.

At this juncture two things are quite plain. One is that many Englishmen are disturbed by chimeras of their own creation; the other, that the policy they would have England pursue is not the policy which the present Cabinet has declared its intention of pursuing. When we say "policy" we refer to principles of action, not to methods of procedure. The two should be kept distinct. For example, no question of policy is involved in peremptorily refusing to suffer at the hands of any third Power interference prejudicial to the free enjoyment of British Treaty rights in China. That is a fundamental duty which no English Government can allow itself to neglect, whatever be its attitude towards a particular crisis. Hence, when the Russian Government employs diplomatic pressure to close the path to British banking enterprise in China, as it is reported to have done in the case of the loan for the Shanhaikwan-Newchwang Railway, England would be untrue to herself did she shrink from any alternative which stern resistance to such lawless interference might present. Everybody is agreed about that. But the point we desire to make is that the vague uneasiness felt in some quarters because concrete evidences of British self-assertion are not overwhelmingly numerous, and the definite complaints of writers like Mr. YORKE that England does not at once proceed to occupy Chusan and Port Hamilton, or some other naval station equally well situated in Korean waters, are based on a false interpretation of British policy. England does not want to join the scramble for Chinese territority. On the contrary, her present aim is to check it. She seeks to preserve China's integrity and to keep the doors of Chinese trade open to all the world. Under Lord SALISBURY'S guidance, she will pursue that policy as long as China permits her to do so. Russia is only a vicarious factor in the situation. The decision rests really with China. If the Peking Government persists in placing its neck under the heel of every foreign Power bold enough to menace it, then the Cabinet in London must adopt new principles of action. In other words, if China obstinately refuses to make any effort on her own behalf, Great Britain will have to abandon her to the fate she invites, and to take measures for the assertion of British interests without regard to the interests of China as an empire. Pending the final decision on that point, it is inevitable that the course of England's policy should not be marked by brilliant coups. She represents a conservative and protective power pitted against radical and aggressive rivals, and the activity will seem to be all on their side. No one doubts, we presume, that if she hold up her hand, the opposition of the States now working against her could be immediately changed into coöperation. No one doubts that she could conclude an agreement relieving herself of all further antagonism and securing a large addition to her territory and wealth. But she is happily resolved not to adopt that course unless the possibility of avoiding it is destroyed by China's persistent helplessness. Meanwhile patriotic Britons must possess their souls in patience. There is nothing uncertain about the mood of the nation at all events. That has been declared in the most unequivocal terms, and the declaration will have its effect on the statesmen in London, though, for our own part, we do not believe that any such incentive was required.

SPANISH RULE.

A STRONG indictment of Spanish rule and of Spanish military methods in Cuba and the Philippines is published in the last numbers of the Contemporary and Fortnightly Reviews. It is very difficult to give full credence to the evidence adduced, but the theory that prejudice is mainly responsible for these accusations can scarcely be entertained when we observe that three independent witnesses concurrently furnish testimony of a most damning character. Miss L. M. J. GARNETT, who writes in the Fortnightly, does not, indeed, employ any strong terms against the Spaniards. The sole purpose of her essay is to describe the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands as they are by nature, without any special reference to the administrative methods of their rulers, and we may remark, en passant, that if the portrait she draws be at all correct, there is no reasonable prospect that success can attend any experiment of independence for the Islands. Incidentally to her principal subject, however, she says:—"Certainly the Spaniards have, by their misgovernment, hardly less forfeited here than in Cuba all rightful claim to remain in possession after defeat in the war which that misgovernment has provoked;" and elsewhere she wishes that "the near future may bring better government to the rightly rebellious Philippine Islanders." But if this lady's testimony has corroborative value, it is by the writings of Mr. JOHN FOREMAN and Mr. G. C. MUSGRAVE that British public opinion will be principally influenced. The former deals with the Philippines. Setting out from the Treaty of Tordesillas, concluded at the beginning of the sixteenth century upon the lines of the POPE'S judgment by which all regions outside Europe, known and unknown, were divided between Spain and Portugal, Mr. FOREMAN succinctly sketches the history of the Islands and the ethnology of their inhabitants down to the present day. It would scarcely be possible to compress his story into smaller space without sacrificing intelligibility, and besides our object here is to note certain phases only of the narrative. Religious fanaticism is represented as having been the guiding principle of Spain's rule. If the soul of the native could not be satisfactorily prepared for a future state, his body must be destroyed. On the other hand, the islander is intellectually or intuitively unable to extend conscientious belief to transcendental Christianity. Thus from generation to generation, in the early days, armed expeditions carried fire and the sword among people, who passively resisted what they could not understand, until the name "Castilla" became a sound of terror, and a system of enforced discipline was established which had the effect of "taming the masses into orderly beings." Manila was founded in 1571, and during the next century and a half the government of the provinces is said to have been in the hands of low-class Spanish adventurers, whose rule was productive of shocking abuses. Over and above the provincial governors, over and above the Governor-General himself, are the four corporations of Friars, the Austin, the Dominican, the Franciscan, and the Recoleto. These priestly rulers shrink from no excess or atrocity. Now, we find them causing a Governor-General to be poisoned; now, instigating the murder of another and hooting his dead body through the streets. But Mr. FOREMAN'S portrait of the ecclesiastical system and its administrators must be given in his own words:—

> Manila is an archbishopric and there are six provincial bishoprics. The total number of parishes will be about 620, of which the friars hold about 95 per cent. As parish priest the Spanish friar is beyond all control of the civil government. He can neither sue nor be sued. He is quite independent of all State authority. He may prove to be the vilest criminal with all impunity. His superiors would pretend to punish him, but they would never expel him; they are themselves sheep who protect their own lambs. He acts, however, as voluntary (and very willing) Government agent. He meddles in every public affair of the township by recognised right. If he cannot have things all his own way and influence every public act, from the election of native headman downwards, he singles out for revenge all those who have outvoted him. And this is generally what happens, at one time or another, in half the parishes. If a young man, who has been educated in Manila or Hong kong, returns to his native town with somewhat advanced ideas, or merely salutes the priest as a gentleman instead of kissing his hand as his spiritual father, he too is marked for social ruin one day. The father of a family of attractive daughters has also to be careful lest the charms of his off-spring bring about his own fall. In short, in one way or another, the native who possesses anything worth having has either to yield to the avarice, lust, or insolence of the Spanish priest or to risk losing his liberty and position in life. The parish priest has simply to address what is called an "oficio" (official advice) to the governor of the province, who remits it to the Governor-General, stating that he has reason to believe that the individuals mentioned in the margin are persons of doubtful morality, or conspirators, disloyal, or whatever he may choose to dub them, and recommend their removal from his parish. In due course a couple of civil guards will suddenly appear at the door of each named individual. Without warrant or explanation of any kind further than "by order of the governor," he is marched off to the capital town and cast into prison. Later on he is sent up to Manila, and, without trial or even defined sentence, he is banished to a far distant island. In 1896 I met three old friends of mine on board a steamer, who were being transported in precisely similar circumstances. I could hardly believe my own eyes. They were well-to-do planters, and the last time I saw them, prior to this occasion, I was the guest of one of them in their town of Taal (Batangas Province). His well-served table, his carriage and horses, had been at my disposal. Now, alas! I found these men treated as criminals, with iron anklets slipped on one iron bar and padlocked. They were on the upper deck, exposed to the rain, sun, and heavy dews day and night. All I could do for them was to secretly supply them with food and clothing. In the law courts nothing can be obtained without "greasing the palm," and then it only brings a sentence with a loop-hole for reopening the case when the judge likes. The same system of "squeeze" obtains in all the Government departments, from the half-dollar slipped into the hand of the native scrivener to the thousand dollars or more quietly laid on the table of the dignified holder of the scales of justice.

From this story it is easy to infer the objects of the rebellion. Mr. FOREMAN sums them up thus:—(1) The expulsion of the monastic orders; (2) the abolition of the Governor-General's arbitrary power to banish without accusation, trial, or sentence; (3) restoration to the natives of the lands held by the religious orders; (4) a limitation of the arbitrary powers of the civil guard; (5) no arrest without judge's warrant; and (6) the abolition of 15 days per annum compulsory labour. These terms were conceded, it is said, by the Treaty of Biac-na-Bato, signed on the 14th of last December between the Governor-General and AGUINALDO. But, according to Mr. FOREMAN, no sooner was the Treaty signed and the rebellion scotched than the promises made by Spain were all ignored.

This incident brings us at once to Cuba, where a similar breach of faith is charged against Spain by Mr. G. C. MUSGRAVE. The Treaty of Zanjon, concluded in 1878 between the insurgent Cubans and General CAMPOS, was "shamelessly repudiated" as soon as Cuba had been pacified, and to the resulting loss of confidence in Spanish promises is attributed the determination of subsequent insurgents to fight for complete independence or death. As to the conditions produced by misrule in the island, Mr. MUSGRAVE says:—

> Not one-fifteenth of the land is under cultivation, despite the unrivalled soil, though the island has been a commercial gold mine to Spain in the past. Under judicious development and administration Cuba could supply the markets of the world with special products, while her unrivalled tobacco and sugar alone would ensure her trade predominance in the Western hemisphere. It is not my intention to deal at length with Spanish misgovernment. Sufficient to say that, despite the large revenue raised by excessive export and import duties and taxation, nothing has been done to effect internal improvements. There are thousands of miles of camino Real (royal highroad) marked on the map, but they are little better than sheep-tracks, and, with one exception in Havana, there is not a road worthy the name. Wheel traffic is impossible in the interior, and communication is entirely cut off in the wet season. The want of roads is not so severely felt in the western half of Cuba, for the railroads, built by private enterprise and trammelled heavily by the Government, open up the country, affording transport for tobacco and sugar-cane to the capital, and thus keeping up communication with the outside world. Away from the railroad, and also in the immense eastern provinces of Puerto Principe and Santiago de Cuba, miles of arable land lie idle, while rich estates languish, being dependent on transport by mule-back, and unable to bring out machinery for preparing sugar, coffee, or cocoa in any quantity, though these grow in abundance and of splendid quality.

But these statements, serious an indictment as they constitute, fade into insignificance compared with Mr. MUSGRAVE'S account of the measures adopted to quell the rebellion. All Spaniards who go to Cuba, he tells us, join the volunteer organization in the Island, because they thus escape military liability at home. Hence the volunteers, some 40,000 strong in Havana alone, consist for the most part of the lowest elements of the population, and the excesses committed by them make up a shocking tale. It was to satisfy these blood-thirsty "braves" that General WEYLER received the appointment of Captain-General of Cuba, and what happened after his arrival is best told in the words of Mr. MUSGRAVE himself :—

Until this date the revolution had remained mainly in the hands of "Orientals," the inhabitants of eastern Cuba, and the educated and better class Cubans, while sympathising with the cause, had not actively participated in the rebellion. Captain-General Weyler made no attempt to conceal his feelings and intentions. Speaking at his reception on landing in Havana, he raised his thin gloved hand, and stated that he came there to make war, a pitiless war, on Spain's enemies, who would find that his hand was gloved with steel, and he promised also to speedily pacify the Cubans. His now historic reconcentracion decree, which was published October 21, 1896, and the brutality with which it was enforced, spelt the absolute loss of Cuba to Spain, and the addition of a further revolting chapter to her history, already sullied by the deeds of Torquemada, Alva, and more modern prototypes. Under its principal clauses all the inhabitants of the country districts were given eight days to abandon their homes and come into the fortified towns and cities. All individuals found outside the lines after that date would be treated as rebels, irrespective of age or sex—in other words, would be killed at sight. All transport of food from the towns was forbidden, and an offer was made to the insurgents to surrender within the eight days of grace. When this prescribed period had expired, the entire country was to be laid waste with the view of starving out the rebels. It was the turning point of the struggle. Every Cuban then had to decide—Cuba or Spain. Which? To go to the towns meant starvation to all, and compulsory military service for the men. The days of grace expired almost before the people realised the order; but, like an angry dog let loose, Weyler then led 16,000 troops to start the "pacification" of Cuba. Starting in Pinar del Rio the columns began looting, burning, and devastating the country, and slaying the unfortunate wretches that fell into their hands. It was the people's awakening. Sorrowfully the women and children relinquished their homes and went to the towns, the men drove their cattle before them, and joined their insurgent brothers in the hills. Thus at the outset Weyler forced the best blood of the island and unlimited food supplies into the hands of the insurgents, and thousands of Cubans, who would have continued on their farms with some semblance of loyalty to Spain, were turned into bitter enemies by the confiscation of their homes and property and the separation of their families. Like a consuming fire Weyler's hordes advanced, leaving a blackened desert in their trail, as he led his men from one province to another, proclaiming each in succession "pacified." His guerilla, or irregulars, had full play, hunting out and murdering the miserable fugitives who had taken refuge in the woods after remaining in their homes until the last. Reliable authorities assert that over two thousand innocent persons were thus killed in Pinar del Rio alone during the pacifying process; but if this number is exaggerated, there is positive proof that many hundreds of terror-stricken rustics perished at the hands of the brutal soldiery.

The provinces laid waste were Pinar del Rio, Havana, Matanzas, and Santa Clara. It was in the north of the last province that I personally witnessed the barbarity of Weyler's orders. In Sagua la Grande the irregulars under Colonel Benito Carrera, guided by negro desperadoes, who knew every inch of the country, routed out the people, using bloodhounds to track down fugitives, and outraging women and girls even to death. The scenes of the Indian Mutiny and the revolting acts of the Sepoys were equalled by Carrera's men. This officer himself brutally tortured prisoners by tearing off their nails to make them reveal the hiding place of other unfortunates, and on the outskirts of Sagua city he cut down a cripple lad who made a spirited answer to the interrogation of his mother. Several official protests against this monster were made by Colonel Barker, the United States Consul at Sagua, though his reports, in common with the statements of other consuls in Cuba, were not published by the State Department, and he was warned from Washington not to utter for publication anything that would cause bad feeling against Spain and endanger Americans in the island. For helping starving Cubans the Colonel has twice had to barricade his house and wait, Winchester in hand, while a mob of volunteers debated on the advisability of burning out the Yankee.

Meanwhile the thousands of homeless people who were now crowded into the towns built themselves crazy shelters on the piece of waste ground. The better class had money, and a few were able to find a refuge in the United States. With the country a desert in which the towns stood as oases, food was soon at famine prices, and the truth dawned upon these people that their homes had been ruthlessly destroyed and their crops burnt without a single provision being made for their subsistence. Private charity did a little, but starvation soon appeared, and in a few weeks it was general. The pen fails to describe the horrible scenes to be witnessed in these settlements—four or five thousand women and children and a few old men dumped down to exist as best they might in the outskirts of a city enclosed in a barricade of barbed wire, with forts at frequent intervals past which no one could venture on pain of death. Without the commonest sanitary measures, they existed, and some are still existing—the wives and children of once wealthy farmers and planters—huddled in with the negroes who once worked on their estates. Their food was the refuse from the swill tubs and scrapings from the gutters, and it is marvellous how long life can be sustained on these morsels. Even in Havana city, where they can beg in the streets, and where food was never scarce among the residents as in less favoured towns, I have seen children lick the blood off the stones at the shambles, and all the inhabitants of Los Fossos that had strength to crawl hastened one day to the beach to fight over the putrid carcase of a cow that was washed ashore. Those that procured chunks ate this meat raw, and this in sight of the Prado, Havana's fashionable quarter, where high officers live in luxury while bodies of starved victims are picked up on the benches below every day. Most of these settlements are alike. Rows of palm-leaf huts with skin-clothed skeletons laying on a heap of rags on the muddy floor. Babies, hideous mockeries of childhood, lie dying on the breast from which all sustenance has dried, their little bodies covered with a loathsome skin disease, which attacks old and young alike. Young girls, once beautiful, without the clothing demanded by decency, lie on the bare floor moaning with the pangs of hunger. They have probably had the alternative of another fate; for an abominable traffic in mere children has been carried on openly, the girls usually being taken through misrepresentation to houses of ill-fame in the cities, many passing from Havana to Mexico, and points further south, before they become aware of their cruel position, while others enter the life with their eyes open, accepting their fate as inevitable. In some huts one or two bodies are sure to be found, the relatives crying over the worn out corpse of the dear one, so happily released from further suffering, and awaiting the advent of the dead cart on its gruesome rounds. Over all is a sickening smell of disease and death, while shrieks and curses of crazed victims raving in delirium and the general wails of hunger add to the horrors of the scene. In January of 1897, when I first visited these settlements, they were comparatively full, but in the October following there was a shocking difference, a miserable remnant alone remaining. The numbers of those who perished through starvation up to January 31 of this year have been estimated by various authorities with widely divergent results, one report stating that over 500,000 had perished. This I think is an exaggeration, but after personal visits to all the settlements of importance in the island, and careful inquiry into official statistics, especially the church registers, which record only those bodies buried in consecrated ground, I estimate that at least 400,000 miserable wretches have died of starvation and disease though the reconcentracion, and that 100,000 more must die under any circumstances. The consular reports to the United States do not deal with the many small interior towns, places of 500 inhabitants and an ingenio or sugar mill, where the people are chiefly employed. Into single settlements like these, especially in Matanzas and Santa Clara Provinces, 3,000 homeless people have been penned up to die without causing attention. With the tons of food recently shipped from the United States, the supply has been insufficient to relieve even those starving in the seaports.

WEYLER has been recalled and his successor, Captain-General BLANCO, is described by Mr. MUSGRAVE as "a brave and humane man, esteemed highly" by the rebel leaders. But BLANCO appeared too late upon the scene. No one doubts that Spain has able administrators and great generals, but it appears to be her unhappy doom that the task of dealing with crises in her affairs falls at the outset into the hands of men who by their incompetence and excesses create hopeless situations. Mr. MUSGRAVE says that if Spain had sent to Cuba "one-fourth of her vast army, picked the men, equipped and shod them carefully, trained them for a few weeks and provided transport, the Cuban rebels would have been crushed at the outset." Cuba is lost to her now, however, and while we can not but sympathise with her misfortunes, it is only right to note facts which, if they be even partially correct, amply justify the intervention of the United States.

THE CEMENT COMPANIES.

Japan, it seems, will not have to wait long for her era of "trusts," "railway kings," and the other outgrowths of modern commerce. We have seen how the cotton-spinning companies are combining to form a monster association for the purpose of reducing production and thus maintaining prices. It appears that the cement firms are about to adopt the same policy. There are ten cement firms in Japan. At one time they did a fine business, when railway building, harbour making, and other enterprises were in a state of feverish activity after the war. But they have felt the recent depression which affects all branches of business, and have come to the conclusion that their only plan is to combine for the purpose of putting an end to competition among themselves. Nine of the companies are said to have agreed to that course, but one—the Kitsugawa—stands aloof. We read in vernacular journals that there is a legal difficulty connected with this action. Each of the companies, being duly registered, has the status of a juridical person in the eyes of the law, and the question is, can a union of juridical persons hold that status? We do not see that it makes much difference for the purposes contemplated by the association.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE.

There are many journalistic suggestions that Japan should endeavour to be represented at the approaching conference in Paris, since she is vitally interested in the fate of the Philippines. Evidently Japanese public opinion does not take much account of French, German, or Russian neutrality. The idea is that those States are preparing to interfere, not in the interests of peace or the balance of power, as they pretend, but to obtain for themselves some of the spolia opima by a display of united force; and that the really neutral countries, England and Japan, ought to prepare to counteract the design. Such notions may be true enough and wise enough in their way, but, according to present appearances, the only Powers represented at the Conference are to be the United States and Spain. The telegraph says that the belligerent Powers are to appoint commissioners—not more than five each—who shall meet in Paris not later than October the 1st. There is no prospect now apparent of the conference's assuming larger dimensions. When the result of its deliberations is announced will be the time for foreign interference, and we presume that the Japanese Government will not be found unprepared for that contingency.

Digitized by Google

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF CURRENT JAPANESE LITERATURE.

The Taiyō publishes the views of Viscount Aoki on certain provisions of the new Civil Code. It having been alleged that some parts of this code concede too much to foreigners and are opposed to Japanese customs and traditional instincts, Viscount Aoki was asked to state to a member of the staff of the Taiyō his opinions on this subject. The following is the gist of what he is reported to have said on the occasion :—Ever since the new treaties were signed this question has received my earnest attention, and I have come to the conclusion that one of the conditions of a treaty that grants to us equal rights with Western countries must be a readiness on our part to conform our customs as far as possible to those of Occidental nations. The old marriage and inheritance laws of Japan are deemed semi-barbarous by Europeans. Customs that are bad, however old, must be reformed. Every country has its own spirit and character. The counterpart of what we call yamato-damashii is found in all European countries. When the interests of Western nations differ and there is friction between them, there is invariably a display of patriotism which is no less fervid than what we see here. But one of the conditions of international intercourse is the sinking of differences as much as possible; and emphasis is necessarily given to this sentiment in the treaties which have been made by us with Western states. It might seem as though I failed to recognise Japanese merits in my desire to introduce foreign ways. This is not so. There is a great deal that is superior in our Oriental system. But it cannot be said that we are living up to our principles. In the Great Learning (大學) it is said, "In things there is a cause and an effect, a beginning and an end. To know that which is first and that which is last is to be not far off the true way." And again it is said that "the heart must be made upright, self-control exercised, and the household properly managed," and then a country can be governed with ease. Modern politicians are far from carrying out this counsel. They profess to be benefactors of the country, but how many of them are there that know how to control themselves, and how many are there whose households are ruled as they ought to be? To expect good results where the sources are polluted is vain. The word jichisei (self-government) is very fashionable among us, but how little of the real thing implied by the term is to be found! How unsuitable for their position are many of the members of the Diet! It was intended that only those who had shown competence in their own districts and gained local experience by taking part in municipal or district government should offer themselves as candidates for Diet membership, but instead of this vacancies are filled by men who are not even known in the districts for which they stand and many of whom owe their election to the free use of money. With the fountain head thus contaminated, is it any wonder that the streams are impure?

In the August 5th number of the Taiyō, the views of Count Okuma on education are given by an interviewer. Those whose watchword is progress and enlightenment, says Count Okuma, find themselves greatly hindered by the conservatism of educationists. There is no doubt about it that the majority of elementary school teachers are conservatives and anti-foreign, and that the lads who call out ketōjin and akahige when foreigners pass are only reflecting the sentiments of their teachers. And as for the views of the teachers, they may be traced to the normal schools, where they have been drilled by instructors of the Chinese antiquated type, who prate much about the five virtues, but who are by no means striking examples of the power and beauty of these virtues. The inconsistency between lofty pretensions and actual conduct manifests itself in every country, but is nowhere more marked than in China, where in politics high moral principles exist only in name. Japan's anti-foreign feeling is derived from China. The more the old system of education is kept to and Chinese models extolled the more will young men be apt to grow up with narrow conceited notions as to their superiority to foreigners. While Marquis Saionji was Minister of Education, he created great enmity by espousing cosmopolitanism and setting his face against Chinese conservatism. The policy of the Mombushō, it is affirmed, has not been formally changed, but there are many evidences that things are going back into the old rut and that the teaching in the normal schools is by no means abreast of the age. The narrowness complained of is the result of a too exclusive study of Chinese and Japanese history and ignorance of the course of events in Europe and America. The scope of study requires enlargement and teachers need to be impressed with the importance of their membership in the great human family and of the virtues vis à vis all human beings which it is incumbent on them to practice.

A dictionary called the Kotoba-no-Izumi has been published by the Okura Shōten. It covers 1,900 pages and is now bound in 6 volumes. It sells at 6 yen 50 sen per copy. The compiler is Mr. Ochiai Naobumi, of the First Higher School. It is stated that the dictionary contains 130,000 words; in addition there are appended some 800 terms used in Yezo only. The work aims at being thorough, even including provincialisms, secret language, Loochooan, and words of European origin. In a review of the dictionary contributed to the Yomiuri Shimbun by a member of the Imperial University, it is highly praised, being pronounced in every way superior to such works as the Genkai, the Nihon-daijiran, the Teikoku-daijiten, and the Nihon-daijiten, containing nearly twice as many words as the best of these lexicons, and furnishing more minute explanations of each word. The reviewer thus sums up the defects of the work :—(1) Want of clear arrangement of the words, so as to facilitate reference. (2) Inferiority and superfluity in the illustrations furnished. (3) Injudicious selection of the names of persons to be noticed. In some cases noted men are not mentioned, in others space is given to men not widely known. (4) Inconsistency in the selection of places of note, rivers, mountains, &c. (5) The paucity of colloquial terms used in the Tokugawa era compared with those in modern use. (6) Inequality in the space devoted to the celebrated places of the various provinces of Japan. (7) Difference in the number of technical terms given under the various headings. Over against these defects the writer of the review places the following merits :—(1) Great comprehensiveness as regards the terms supplied, including ancient and modern words, general and special terms, Chinese, colloquial, proverbs, and provincialisms. (2) The furnishing of information not usually found in ordinary lexicons, such as the names of books, places, men, &c. (3) The fulness and discernment of its etymology. (4) The lucidity and conciseness of its definitions of all but technical terms.

The Bakumatsu-Gaikō-dan, by Mr. Tanabe Taichi, is a history of the foreign relations of the Baku-fu during the last years of its existence, but it covers more ground than its title indicates; since it contains an account of Japan's foreign intercourse under the first Tokugawa Shōguns. The book is for sale at 1 yen 20 sen per copy at the Fuzambō Shuppan-sho, Urajimbō-chō, Kanda, Tōkyō. The work throws considerable light on some of the questions now engaging the attention of Oriental statesmen, says the Yomiuri Shimbun. It is said to be well written and neatly illustrated.

A "History of Formosa," originally published in German by Professor Riess, has been translated into Japanese by Mr. Yoshikuni Tokichi, and sells at 25 sen per copy at the Fuzambō Shuppan-sho. The work discusses among other subjects the origin of the Formosans and compares them with the Loochooans. Dr. Riess has collected a quantity of most trust-worthy matter and has added a valuable contribution to the small stock of literature dealing with Formosa.

Dr. Katō Hiroyuki a short time ago delivered a lecture on the possibility of founding a Universal State. The lecture is reported in the Toyotetsu-gaku. The subject is purely speculative, in our opinion, but Mr. Katō does not so treat it. He thinks it within the range of practical politics, but he declares himself unable to fix a date for the realisation of his Utopia. Dr. Katō observes that the philosophers who have discussed this question in Europe and who have believed in the possibility of universal empire have either held that such an empire must rely on physical strength for its support or must be based on reason or religion. So far history has gone to prove that neither great conquerors like Alexander, Cæsar, and Napoleon, nor great religious teachers like Shaka, Mahomet, and Christ have succeeded in founding universal empires in the ordinary sense of the term empire. And there is nothing in the present state of the world to indicate that either plan is likely to succeed in the future. But Dr. Katō argues that there is a sense in which a union of States founded on reason is capable of being realised. There are many particulars in which civilised nations are at one. In commerce, industry, science, and morality, in many of their methods of government, there is no disagreement. Into the comity of civilised nations Japan has entered, and her future must necessarily be greatly affected by this fact. There are those who think that the whole world will in time become civilised, and thus all under heaven will be united, but there seem to me no grounds for expecting such a result, says Dr. Katō. There are whole races of men that will never take kindly to European civilisation. The possibility of uniting under one central Government a number of states that possess unlimited local autonomy has been proved by the history of Germany and the United States. Dr. Katō confesses that the present attitude of great European Powers to each other does not look much like preparation for a Universal State, but he thinks that if the majority of the great Powers can construct a platform on which to combine, an unwilling Power like Russia can be forced into compliance. He does not think that the vision is to be realised without resorting to physical force, but the principal basis of union will be similarity of sentiment—a feeling that the welfare of the world will be best promoted by a great union of states.

Dr. Nakajima is the author of a work called Seiyōtetsugaku-shoshi, "A short History of Western Philosophy," 2 vols., price 3 yen. The work covers over 1,100 pages, and seems to have been compiled with great care.

Dr. Inoue Tetsujiro, under the title of "The World and Human Nature from an educational point of view," in a small volume, which sells at 25 sen, lectures school teachers on their many deficiencies. The theory on which the work is based and on which so much of the newspaper writing on the same subject rests is that persons engaged in education should not claim any special emolument, that they should work from love of the profession and not for the sake of pecuniary profit. All this sounds very grand, but statistics show that the theory is incapable of being carried into practice. The spirit of the age and common sense are opposed to the idea of men undertaking drudgery while receiving only the pay of policemen or coolies.

Number 14 of the Shakai Zasshi has an article by Mr. Yamagata on "The Degeneration of School Teachers and Students," which consists of a collection of all the unfavourable facts that have been made public during the past few years. But the article is very one-sided. The writer is evidently one of those plaintive pessimists whose croaking is heard continually in every part of Japan. Another writer in the same magazine complains of the wholesale manner in which Japanese writers steal from foreign books without acknowldgement. He quotes an instance where a writer called "Kuwano" under the title of Bankin no Shakai Gaku-setsu (Recent Sociological Theories) publishes as his own long extracts from foreign works. In one case no less than 25 pages are translated verbatim from a well-known German work entitled Sociologie und Politik without any acknowldgment whatever. But this is not all. This king of literary pirates has had the audacity to publish a preface to his work in which he boasts that he alone among modern writers has propounded for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen new sociological theories. The views expressed in his book he represents to have been elaborated by his own original mind. "I have known many plagiarists," says the writer in the Shakai Zasshi, "but none so impudent as the compiler of the Bankin no Shakai-gaku-setsu. He deserves to be held up to the scorn of his contemporaries."

The Nihon Bijutsu Kyōkai has received from the Vice-Chairman of the Committee of Management of Exhibits for the forthcoming Paris Exhibition a notification to the effect that applications for leave to send exhibits far exceed the space available for those sent by any one country, so that, with every desire to treat Japan liberally, on account of the progress in art she has made in recent years, the Committee will be obliged to confine the accepted exhibits to specimens of classes of art and to reject duplicates. They recommend that a judicious selection be made of articles that are likely to sell well in foreign markets, thus insuring satisfactory financial results.

The Waseda Bungaku has a lengthy article on the question of the Nude in Art, a topic which has been very earnestly discussed in connection with a picture published in the Shinchō Gekkan and a painting by Mr. Kuroda Kiyoteru exhibited by the Hakubukai. The general subject has so often engaged the attention of writers in the West that there is perhaps little that is new to be said on it. But there are one or two particulars in which Japanese ideas on the nude are quite different from those of the majority of Occidentals. The naked figure, says the Waseda Bungaku, does not suggest anything evil to the ordinary Japanese mind. He is accustomed to the sight and regards it with indifference. While this is so, the Japanese lover of art can appreciate beauty of form in the human frame, whether male or female and a nude picture could never shock any person of this kind. The Waseda Bungaku is of opinion that there has been much unnecessary fuss over this subject. It quotes from a variety of journals on the question and then expresses the opinion that nude figures in art do not occupy the position of importance given to them by many writers. As to how far the pictures of nude females, which have attracted so much attention, and others of the same kind, can claim to be ranked as specimens of high class art is a question, says the Waseda Bungaku, which we leave undiscussed.

The Kyōiku jiron reiterates, under the heading of "Society and Education," the everlasting complaint that modern fiction is inflicting infinite harm on the minds of the young, and even proposes that the pupils of elementary and middle schools should be forbidden to read newspapers containing novels or novelettes; apparently not realising that it would be quite impossible to enforce any such regulation. Most of the newspapers, continues the Kyōiku-jiron, have no object or principles but profit, and while this is so and their contaminating sheets find their way into every house, the teaching of morality in the schools is entirely without effect. The Kyōiku-jiron furnishes examples of the indecent character of the literature referred to and dwells minutely on its pernicious results.

The Kyōiku Kōhō discusses another discouraging feature of modern education, namely the backward state of high class female education. The writer of the article in Number 213 of this magazine, dealing with this subject, is Mr. Naruse Nizō, one of the chief promoters of the Women's University scheme. The following is the gist of Mr. Naruse's observations. Japan being now a progressive country, it is desirable to eradicate from the minds of men as well as women those conservative instincts which block the way to progress. The notions generally prevailing in Japan in reference to women and how they should be treated are still those of the Chinese. The ideas of the girls who undergo training as well as those of their mothers are hereditary and unsuited to the new rôle Japan is playing in the world's history. Coming to the remedies for the existing state of things, it is discouraging to find men like Mr. Izawa Shūji, Marquis Ito, and others, who have given special attention to the subject, unable to agree as to a definite policy to be recommended. All realise the difficulties of the problem of female education, but nobody is ready with a satisfactory solution. All are agreed that there is a great lack of suitable teachers. The present female instructors do not possess sufficient knowledge and force of character to enlist the respect of their pupils. The male instructors who devote themselves to female education are next to none. Then there are financial difficulties of a serious kind in this class of education. Since the war numerous indeed are the enterprises that are at a standstill for want of funds, and as for education, its efficiency to-day will not bear comparison with what it was prior to the war.

The behaviour of Danjurō, the great actor, has of late been the subject of severe comment in both magazines and newspapers. It is said that, while his acting has degenerated, he has put on airs that make it very hard for stage managers to do business with him. One complaint made is that after acting for 40 days at Osaka, for which he was paid 50,000 yen, he was requested, in consideration of the losses sustained by his employers, to extend the period for three days at the same rate of payment, but that he refused to do so. Then it is said that he asked 12,000 yen for one act only of the play called Kanjinchō, which was being put on the stage at the Kabukiza, and that he even objected to Kikugorō as a fellow-actor and demanded the employment of his (Danjurō's) own pupils only.

A member of the Council of the Gakushi-Kaiin, Mr. Sugi Kōji has been investigating the physique of the rising generation. The result of his inquiries are given in the Tōkei Shūshi (Statistics), from which we take the following particulars:—According to statistics in the possession of the Military Headquarters Staff the height of army recruits has for several years past been falling off. This Mr. Sugi attributes to excessive application and disregard of the rules of health on the part of the student class. The physique of the mass of soldiers who have lately joined the ranks is said to be far inferior to that of foreign troops. In general intelligence the Japanese youth ranks high, the intellect of a lad of 15 or 16 is usually more developed than is the case with European boys of the same age. But the physical deterioration which has been proved to exist is, says Mr. Sugi, a cause for great anxiety, and it is incumbent on the Mombushō and all who are engaged in education to devise schemes for reducing the strain on the minds of the young which the present multiplicity of subjects involves. Unaccustomed to study statistics or to take any trouble to collect them, the Japanese are apt to go on blindfold from year to year, not knowing what the future has in store. In countries like Germany the physical capabilities of the average youth is perfectly well known to the Government and they can calculate accordingly. Japan's information on these subjects is most imperfect, while what it does possess is anything but reassuring.

In a recently issued number of the Waseda Bungaku there is a review of the tendency of thought during the first half of the current year. Degeneration and stagnancy as regards the higher spheres of thought and out and out materialism in the lower are according to this the leading characteristics of the times. organ No discerning person can fail to see, says the Waseda Bungaku, that morally Japan has lost by her war with China; men's thoughts have been turned into new channels. Material progress, and not high moral or intellectual attainment, is the chief thing sought after by the bulk of the nation. The range of modern literature has become extremely narrow. Readers for the most part are no longer interested in questions that have little bearing on every day life and their material interests. From being absorbed by the abstract, men's minds have passed to the extreme of being absorbed by the concrete. There are many evils attached to the change that has taken place, but they are not all of the same kind, and there is such a thing as one evil modifying another. . . . . Turning to literature, the three serials that have figured conspicuously in publishing the works of famous novelists are the Shin Shōsetsu, the Shinchō Gekkan and the Bungei Kurabu. The chief contributors to these magazines have been Ryurō, Chūgai, and Kōrō. Rohan has been silent. One of the above publications, the Shinchō Gekkan, has been discontinued.

There has been much discussion as to the style adopted by novelists and a still more important subject, the reform of both the written and spoken languages and the adoption of substitutes for the ideographs now in use, has been discussed in some quarters with great earnestness. Other topics that have occupied attention in the literary world are the nude in art; Mr. Danjurō's pompous airs; the acting of the Chikushō, hara, at the Sōshi theatre; Dr. Toyama's appointment as Minister of State and his sudden removal from office; Mr. Uchimura's exit from the staff of the Yorodzu Chōhō, and the establishment of a new journal, the Tōkyō Dokuritsu, by him, and a few other changes of a similar kind.

From another source we learn that through the efforts of Mr. Kojima Itto, Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō, and others, a society called the Kokuji Kairyō Kaisha (Letter Reform Society) has been formed, the object and constitution of which is thus stated by one or two journals:—(1) The object of the assocation is the reform of the written language of Japan. (2) In effecting this object, it will be the endeavour of the society to adopt the most convenient signs available for the purpose. (3) Any one agreeing with the objects of the society and zealous in the cause is at liberty to become a member. (4) Members shall be divided into (a) investigators, (b) workers, and (c) approvers. (5) The monthly subscription shall be 10 sen. (6) The society shall appoint secretaries, accountants and superintendents. (7) The office of the association shall be the Gakushi-kai Jimusho, connected with the Imperial University.

It is said that Mr. Kojima has been an earnest advocate of the reform for nearly 30 years.

In an interesting article, the Teikoku Bungaku dwells on the fact that there are no writers of historical romances in Japan at the present time. Not long ago the Yomiuri Shimbun made an attempt to revive this class of literature, but failed. No historical novel worthy of preservation has been penned since the days of Bakin, says the Teikoku Bungaku. It adds that since Scott's time the historical romance has deteriorated in England, which is no doubt true, despite the fact that men like Conan Doyle and Stanley J. Weyman, not to mention others, have given us some charming pictures of old English and French life. In addition to being historical, Bakin's works were strictly purpose novels. Each tale was written to illustrate some virtue. At the beginning of the Meiji era there was in our literary world a dead set against this class of story. Strong repugnance to the Buddhist teaching interwoven with Bakin's narrative was also felt in some quarters. Realism in fiction became all the rage and Bakin's works were regarded as out of date. It is to be regretted that so clever a writer as Bakin, who illustrated history as no other Japanese writer has done, should have been condemned on account of the minor defects, if defects they were, displayed in his works. One thing is certain, and that is that in many quarters there is a sincere longing for the appearance of a second Bakin. Since Bakin's time historical research has been carried on with great earnestness and modern scholars possess facilities for obtaining minute information that did not exist in Bakin's time. But Bakin was a great genius in addition to being a great student, and it is questionable whether we shall see his like in our day, concludes the Teikoku Bungaku.

The Sekai-no-Nihon, hitherto a monthly, from September is to become a weekly and is to assume a new form. Henceforth half of its space only will be devoted to magazine articles, the rest will consist of news and discussions thereon. The style of writing is to be simplified and more attention is to be given to the publication of actual facts than to the discussion of mere theories. The views expressed by other journals will occasionally be stated. The first number of the new series will appear on September 10th. The price has been fixed at 4 sen per copy.

According to an article from the pen of Mr. Mitsuishi Shizuo the reform of Japanese orthography is still engaging the attention of scholars The majority seem to be in favour of improving the Japanese kana so as to render them capable of expressing sounds not found in Japanese. Some advocate the use of katakana only, others the exclusive use of hiragana. The former are led by Mr. Kimura Takatarō; the latter by Dr. Inouye Tetsujirō and Mr. Okada Masayoshi. Dr. Inouye expressed his views at considerable length in a lecture delivered to the Gakushikai-in a short time ago. Dr. Inouye recommends that the hiragana now in use should be curtailed by dropping all unnecessary strokes. Dr. Inouye thinks that at no time has the public mind been so ready for a radical change in the method of writing Japanese as at present. He thinks that if a system of signs such as those employed by stenographers were devised they would answer every purpose.

It seems to us that, however advisable the reform may be deemed by leading men, unless the Department of Education can be induced to inaugurate and carry the scheme through, it will never be effected.

FIRES.

About 3 30 on Sunday morning the dismal clanking of the fire bell at the Bluff police station announced the discovery of a fire at 217-B Bluff, the residence of Mr. L. Abenheim, The house was a two-storied one, and was built of wood. By the time the Fire Brigade men at the Bluff station arrived the fire had obtained a firm hold, and the whole of the building was enveloped in flame. The only engine available was a small manual ridiculously inadequate for dealing with so serious a fire, and water could only be got from the various wells in the neighbourhood. In these circumstances there was no hope of saving the place, and the Brigade directed their attention to attempting to confine the fire, and prevent it spreading to the neighbouring houses. In this, by dint of hard work and with the assistance of the Bluff Police Brigade, they managed to succeed, except that a momban's house attached to Mr. Gibbs' premises was destroyed. Mr. Abenheim's house was left a complete ruin, only the chimneys remaining standing. A few articles of furniture were saved, and the fire was fortunately discovered in time for all the inmates to make their escape. The blazing wood made a huge glare in the sky, and many who were aroused by the fire bell thought an even more serious conflagration was in progress. The fire is alleged to have originated in the lamp room, but nothing positive is known. The loss is covered by insurance in the National Assurance Society of Ireland (Messrs. Isaacs & Co., agents).

It should be added that Superintendent Morgin, of the Fire Brigade, wishes to express thanks to the ladies of the Seamen's Union Mission Bible Readers' School, who gave the brigade the use of the numerous rain water tanks attached to the School.

Fire broke out on the 27th, at 3.30 a.m., at Kanasugi-kami-machi, Shitaya, Tokyo, and three houses were burnt down. An infant was killed.

Early on the morning of the 30th fire broke out at the office of the Shinagawa Electric Light Company, and destroyed the building. The fire is said to have arisen from the sparks of a tobacco pipe.

JAPANESE FACTS AND COMMENTS.

Friction between the former Liberals and Progressists continues, says the Mainichi, and threatens to bring about a rupture before long. A clique headed by Viscount Takashima is said to have held secret conferences at the Viscount's residence for the formation of an anti Constitutional Party. They hope to have the aid of the National Unionists, who succeeded in returning nineteen of their number to the Diet. Among zealous advocates of the project are Messrs. Oye Taku, Furusawa Shigeru, Tokutomi Iichiro, and Takenouchi Go. These are said to be indirectly supported by Messrs. Oi Kentaro, Arai Shogo, and Ishizaka Masataka, of the Constitutional Party. The latter statement, however, can hardly be credited. It is said that the new party is to be joined by a number of leading members of the former Cabinet, who are uncompromisingly opposed to the present Ministry. Negotiations have been already opened with Barons Ito and Suyematsu and Messrs. Kaneko and Sone, who have all agreed to act under the direction of Viscount Takashima. Messrs. Oye and Takenouchi are busily engaged in trying to persuade the "business men" to embrace their cause.

Mr. Consul Mutsu, of San Francisco, sends the following report dated the 25th July:—Two or three leading tea dealers to whom enquiries have been addressed report that the demand for Japanese tea has in no way decreased, and the trade may be restored to its former prosperity in the near future. During the past two or three years, however, Japanese and Chinese teas have shown a tendency to decline in favour, owing presumably to competition with India and Ceylon. The taxation of tea seems to involve a certain degree of injustice when it is remembered that coffee is free of duty, but the Consul thinks the imposition of the new tax will not prove injurious to the prospects of Japanese tea.

According to the Nippon, Mr. Yamada, Vice-Minister of Justice, has requested the Cabinet to convene a special meeting in regard to the election trouble in which he was a prominent figure. Count Okuma is said to have promised to give him a definite reply when he has completed the necessary investigations. Mr. Yamada is indignant at the action of Count Itagaki, who caused the matter to be divulged before it was legally settled, and allowed a certain Liberal organ to publish defamatory statements against Mr. Yamada. Mr. Yamada's proposed resignation, therefore, may be viewed as having changed the situation for the worse. In one respect it is an open declaration of hostility to the existing Cabinet.

According to the Mainichi, a special meeting of the Constitutionalists in the three prefectures of Toyama, Fukui, and Ishikawa, was held at Kanazawa on the 20th instant Mr. Yokuchi, in the chair. Resolutions were passed to the effect that the three prefectures should be united for party purposes, and that a special conference should be held every year previous to the meeting of the Diet. Another motion was passed urging the Government to carry out administrative reforms at once; advising the discontinuance of internal dissensions now noticeable among the members of the Constitutional Party; and securing the completion of a railway between Toyama and Naoyetsu. It was decided that these proposals should be forwarded to the Head Office in Tokyo.

Count Itagaki, Minister for Home Affairs, has distinguished himself by the introduction of sweeping changes in the system of local administration, in which he seems to have secured valuable assistance from the Director of the Prefectural Bureau. With a view to completely eradicating the abuses inherent in local administration, the Count recently issued the following instructions to various prefectures:—In pursuance of directions issued from time to time for the purpose of securing simplicity and perfect adjustment of administrative affairs, it has been decided that the views of the local Governors should be taken into consideration on questions of reform relative to local affairs having more or less connection with the Departments of the Central Government. Much has to be done also in regard to affairs connected with the Prefectural, Rural, and Municipal Offices, the Police and Prison Offices, and their branches, and District Offices of all discriptions. As regards matters which directly concern the people, the utmost simplicity should be exercised in the forms of procedure, in order that they may be properly understood. Radical changes must be effected in order to conduct the administration with the greatest simplicity and celerity.

A report from the Japanese Consul at Mokpho is published in the Mainichi. He states that the matches imported into Mokpho are entirely of Japanese manufacture, and their import is exclusively conducted by Japanese. They are classified as safety, sulphur, and China matches. The first-mentioned are quoted at 2.90 yen per case of 120 packets. The greatest demand seems to exist among Koreans for manufactures bearing the brands of "one deer" and "two deer." The matches of these brands are extremely popular in Fusan, being specially manufactured to order from leading merchants in that p rt. But in Mokpho they have been superseded by sulphur matches and there is no demand. The "horse" and "triangle" brands, recently imported, are now quoted at 19.20 and 18 yen respectively. There are prospects of a steady growth of trade in these matches. The China matches, which are chiefly produced by the Koyekisha, Osaka, are sold for 29.70 yen per case containing 300 pockets of a dozen boxes each. The price includes 2 80 yen for freight and other charges, and 1 40 yen for import duties. Matches of this description have entirely lost popularity among the Koreans, who have ceased to import them, the native merchants being seriously perplexed as to the means of disposing of the stock in hand. As to safety matches, the depression is attributed to the comparatively high quotations caused by their shipment in steamer from Osaka instead of being transported by sailing vessels, as in the case of sulphur and other matches, to Fusan. The Consul recommends transport between Osaka and Mokpho by means of sailing ships.

Rumour has it that the import duties on sugar be 15 per cent., since the total revenue from this source is estimated at 50 million yen. Dealers, however, do not favour such a forecast fixing the amount at less than 20 million yen. A serious diminution in demand is expected. It is said that the leading corporations in Tokyo and wholesale merchants in Yokohama would enter a strong protest if the question of a 15 per cent. duty is introduced in the 13th session of the Diet. The foreign firms in Yokohama and Kobe appear to have communicated to their respective Governments their views against the measure under contemplation. The dealers, are not opposed to the imposition of taxes per se; they simply object to pay more than 10 per cent.

Last year a special committee was appointed by the Tokyo Municipal Council to bring about the speedy completion of much-needed reforms; and as a result of this measure, about 32 highways out of 300 reserved for improvement were dealt with, the work to be effected within ten years. This constituted the first period of the undertaking, and funds amounting to 9 600 yen were allowed for it. The rest of the roads were to be dealt with in the succeeding decade. The programme, however, requires more than 10 million yen for the 1st term alone, and no source of revenue apparently exists to meet the contingency, inasmuch as the City Reform Regulations do not allow special taxes to be collected above the amount of 500,000 yen, of which half has to be paid as interest on Water Works Bonds. Another half therefore is only available for the 31st year. But this would be entirely exhausted in the event of a fire breaking out in two or three places included in the sphere of reform. It has been determined that special taxes shall on one hand be raised to the highest possible limit, and that applications, on the other, shall be forwarded to the Government for a special subsidy. Simultaneously, measures are to be taken to demand the transfer of the Rice Granaries' lots in Asakusa to the ownership of the Tokyo municipality. The Nichi Nichi is responsible for these statements.

Under the caption, the "Formosan Railway Scandal." the Nippon makes the following comments:—The scheme for the construction of a railway from the south to the north of Formosa was set on foot in the 29th year of Meiji, the proposed capital being 15 million yen. Owing to the depression in the financial market, however, seven or eight postponements in the organisation of the company have taken place, and it still fails to commence work. In July last, negotiations with Messrs. Peacock & Co. seemed likely to be successful, and another period of adjournment was granted by the Governor General until October next. But the negotiations now appear likely to end in a complete failure. From a strategical as well as an administrative point of view a Formosan railway cannot for the moment be dispensed with. If private enterprise prove unsuccessful the work ought to be undertaken by the Government. The projectors of the Formosan railway are perfectly aware of the fact that a capital of 15 million yen would not suffice to carry out the work under contemplation. Surely there must be something below the surface in this matter. The Nippon says the fact is that Viscount Takashima, leader of the Satsuma coterie, is at the bottom of the scheme, and it makes very grave charges against the administration of the company's finances.

The question of the state ownership of railways has already been discussed on its merits, and no further comment, remarks the Jiji, is necessary, except to show how the purchase is to be effected. It was contemplated that the four main lines of the Nippon, Kobu, Sanyo, and Kiushiu Railway Companies should be bought, for the time being, by the issue of bonds corresponding in value to 20 or 25 times the amount of the net profits (taken as 5 per cent.) realized by them. The Nippon Railway Company has at times declared a dividend of 10 or even 15 per cent, but this has been only when subsidies were included in the dividends, the average annual profit being 8 per cent. The paid-up capital of the Company amounted at the end of March last to 42,360,000 yen, and debentures to 295,000 yen, making a total of 42.655.000 yen. If 5 per cent. profit is to be taken as the standard in fixing the purchase, the aggregate amount to be paid will be no less than 68,240.000 yen. In the case of the Kobu Railway the rate of profit seems to have been 12 per cent. and its paid-up capital and debentures aggregated 1,710.000 and 140,000 yen respectively, making a total of 1,850.000 yen. The purchase price of this railway is, therefore, estimated at 4.440,000 yen. The Sanyo railway, of which the paid-up capital amounts to 15.630,000 yen and debentures to 2,000,000 yen, which two sums, together with a loan of 220,000 yen, make a total of 17.850,000 yen, has secured 8 per cent. profit, and in consideration of this the purchase is to be fixed at 30,345.000 yen. As for the Kiushiu railway, it has secured 10 per cent. on total working funds of 21,045,000 yen, of which 19.150,000 yen is paid-up capital and 895,000 yen debentures. The purchase price is estimated at 42,090 000 yen. From the above calculations it may be perceived that the total cost of the railways amounts to 145,123,000 yen, and if 5 per cent. bonds are to be issued the interest to be paid annually from the Treasury will be nb less than 7¼ millions. Is it possible for Government to realize a net profit of this amount by taking the four main railways under its control? The question cannot be answered in the affirmitive. That government enterprises are generally attended with on larger expenditure than private undertakings is an undeniable fact. The report of the Railway Bureau for the 29th year of Meiji corroborates this assertion. The ratio of expenses to the receipts realized is stated in the case of government railways at 46 per cent., whereas it does not exceed 42 per cent. in the case of the Nippon Railway, 33 per cent. in that of the Kobu, 40 per cent. in that of the Sanyo, and 30 per cent. in that of the Kiushiu. Even supposing the average amount of expenses to be 40 per cent., it is necessary for government to secure traffic receipts to the amount of 12,500,000 yen to realise a profit of 7½ millions; and it is very doubtful whether the government would be able to secure such a result. The four lines above mentioned are conspicuous among private railways, for solidity of structure but they are by far inferior to government railways both in regard to permanent way and in respect of the trains run on them. If these pass into the hands of the Government and are brought into a state befitting an official enterprise, the amount of expenditure is likely to be increased by 50 or even 60 per cent. Moreover, the extension of stations, reconstruction of bridges and lines, and augmentation of rolling stock would certainly require a fresh outlay of 20 or 30 millions. The financial embarrassment into which the Government has fallen has already necessitated the suspension of all undertakings except those connected with the extension of telegraphs and the construction of war-vessels, fortifications, which can not be dispensed with. How, then, can the Government persuade itself to undertake the purchase of railways which will involve a loss of 3 million year by year. Increased taxation must be adopted, but if to be levier it is only for the purpose of enriching a section of merchants through such a programme as the state ownership of railways, the people must decline to contribute a sen or a rin.

A Government telegram from Vienna published in the Shogyo announces that the Austro-Hungarian Government has consented to the new treaty between Japan and Austro-Hungary being put into operation from the 17th July of the 32nd year of Meiji, and the tariff from the 1st January of the same year. All the formalities in connection with the matter have been completed. The Shogyo says that as the Empire of Austria-Hungary suffers at present from internal troubles, there can be no doubt that the assent to the treaty was the result of the extremely liberal sentiments of the Kaiser Francis Joseph.

Intelligence from Korea published in the Nichi Nichi says that during last month the English Representative obtained the privilege of working mines in a particular section, as the result of negotiations carried on between him and the ex-Korean Minister for Foreign Affairs. The treaty was to be signed and interchanged on the 1st of August. The Korean Government, however, suddenly sought delay and despatched one of the secretaries to the English Representative with a private communication from the new Korean Minister of Foreign Affairs requesting the postponement of the date of signing the proposed treaty. This naturally surprised the English Representative in no small degree. He instantly drove to the Foreign Office, but, finding the Minister already gone home, intimated that the latter's attitude was a violation of international courtesy, and was to be regarded as a serious offence against the Minister of a great country, adding that if this sort of discourtesy were to be repeated, a special audience with the Emperor would be requested. Two or three communications have since passed. On the 15th instant, a definite reply was received by the English Representative to the effect that since the treaty for cöoperation in the working of mines contained a number of articles which could not be approved, the signature must be postponed, and that a fresh conference should be held for the revision of the protocol, the draft of which was to be delivered to the English Representative in a few days.

Mr. Ariga, Superintendent of the Industrial Bureau in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, is represented by the Nippon as having made the following remarks:—Osaka may justly claim to be called the "Manchester of Japan." Her hundreds of chimneys sending up clouds of murky smoke; the stateliness and magnificence of her workshops; the great number of artisans employed in them, and the enormous products of their industry—these are unmistakable signs of the town's unrivalled manufacturing position throughout the Empire. The financial disorganisation of the market has led to the decline of industry, and it was supposed that the supply of artisans would be in excess of the demand. A thorough investigation, however, shows that the reverse is the case. The sanitary arrangements hitherto adopted for artisans have provoked vehement criticism, but the manufacturers seem to have recently introduced extensive reforms so that the system is now approaching a state of perfection. Okayama, though not comparable to Osaka in respect of industry, has nevertheless advanced considerably of late. The wheat straw works, fancy matting, spinning, &c., have made extraordinary progress. The operatives in Okayama are older and more regular in their habits than those of Osaka, most of them being sons of shisoku, who were under rigorous discipline in their youth.

A despatch from Korea, dated 20th instant, and published in the Nippon, describes the arrival of Marquis Ito in Fusan on the morning of that day. The Sōul Gazette (Kanjo Shimpo) speaks of the Marquis as the benefactor of Korea, and lauds him as one of the greatest statesmen of the Orient. He must be welcomed, the Sōul Gazette adds, in a manner worthy of our love and respect for him. The Sōul Independent alluded to the Marquis in a similar tone. A native classical dance was exhibited for the visitor's entertainment.

Not a little excitement was caused by the false intelligence received from Hokkaido a few days ago to the effect that Lieutenant General Nagayama had threatened, in a fit of anger, to kill Mr. Kudo Kokan with a sword. The canard seems to have emanated, according to the Chuo, from the following facts:—At a garden party held by the Governor of Hakkaido on the opening of a railway which forms part of a scheme for establishing railways throughout the length and breadth of the North, the Governor delivered a brief address in which he alluded to his seven predecessors, whom he compared to the seven gods and goddesses of fortune. Lieutenant General Nagayama was compared to Bishamonten. Mr. Kudo Kokan, on behalf of the guests present, then rose and expressed thanks for the entertainment prepared for them, at the same time criticising the administration. Referring to the allegory employed by Governor Sugita he remarked that in the case of the "Bishamon Governor" a military system of administration was adopted to the extent of curbing the liberty of the people. "Surely," said he, "the scheme for colonization ought to be accomplished with the united efforts of both Government and people." No sooner had he finished these remarks than the Lieutenant-General rose and exclaimed: "Never have I, during my tenure of office as Governor of Hokkaido, done anything to restrain the people's freedom. I am a soldier. I can not be present at a place where speeches are tainted with political allusions. Nor am I willing to stay where such rudeness is shown to me." With these words he left the hall in spite of the earnest remonstrance of the Governor. "Were I to remain here any longer," I he added, "I might be betrayed into something extraordinary."

A SERIOUS EPIDEMIC.

Dysentery is still prevalent throughout the provinces, especially, in the prefectures of Yamanashi and Shizuoka. According to the statistics of the Home Department, 877 cases appeared on the 30th ult., and 191 persons died. This makes a total of 40 667 cases from the commencement of the outbreak. Of those attacked 8,132 have died.

THE LIGHTER SIDE OF THE WAR.

I have no desire to wound the susceptibilities of my American friends, remarks Mr. Thos. H. Reid, of the China Mail. Their generous hospitality disarms criticism. They are, writing comprehensively, splendid fellows, hearty, kind, good-humoured, hospitable, modest to a degree little suspected by the average Briton, courteous, and mild in the criticism of our insular idiosyncracies. But their method of running a war lends itself to friendly criticism. A foreign military expert, landed in Cavite or Camp Dewey, at any rate before General Merritt arrived, would have found a rich field for investigation. In another direction—and the fact is so patent to the Americans themselves that no apology is needed for mentioning it—the fortune will be made of the man who first writes the comic history of the invasion of the Philippines. It is full of humorous situations. The mere chronicler of commonplace events cannot do it justice. Neither can the word-painter. It has, unquestionably, a serious side. We are full of sympathy for the patriotic young fellows, who, in an excess of zeal for the honour of their country, have given up the luxuries of life, pleasant homes, and dearly-loved friends, to serve in a far-distant, uncongenial climate, undergoing the perils and discomforts of the sea and the battle-field, with small hope of personal reward or individual glory. Only those who have witnessed the highly-cultured, tenderly-nurtured young men of the United States performing the prosaic drudgery of camp life can fairly estimate what they are suffering for the sake of their country. We can also sympathise from the bottom of our hearts with the relatives of the men who will never return to the homelands. But, as I have said, there are not wanting situations inexpressibly funny.

The sergeant-major of one of the regiments had the sad and unpleasant duty of burying a comrade. As a sergeant-major he is "a griffin." I use the word in its Far Eastern sense. Not knowing very well how to set about the last sad ceremonials he visited the hospital.

"What am I to do?" he asked the hospital steward.

"Wall, I don't know," drawled the steward, whose susceptibilities are blunted by daily dalliance with death. "All we supply, sergeant major, is the corpse!"

Somewhat "rattled," the sergeant-major proceeded to headquarters! Here he saw an official, a clerical-looking gentleman of mild mien and dignified demeanour.

"I've got a dead man on my hands," began the sergeant major, "and I want to know what I am to do with the corpse."

"What was the matter with him?" asked the clerical-looking gentleman.

"Oh, he's just dead!" replied the sergeant-major, determined that he would get in the first hit this time.

"I know he's dead," was the sharp retort, as a fierce eye fixed the unhappy sergeant-major. "What did he die of, you blamed fool?"

"Look you here. I came down here to get information, not to be 'jumped on.'"

The sergeant-major's temper was rising. "Jumped on" is an American term of peculiar significance.

The clerical-looking gentleman then proceeded to explain that he was the Deputy Assistant Adjutant General; that the sergeant-major was scarcely respectful, either in his manner or his language; and that it was customary to address the headquarters' staff differently.

This broke up the sergeant-major. He went back to his adjutant, and begged to be relieved of his rank and duties.

There was some excuse for him. It is difficult to tell from a man's uniform what rank or position he holds in the U.S. Army—difficult to tell whether a man is a "contract doctor" or a brigadier general. The brigadier is generally the more modest and least conspicuous!

A LITERARY ACHIEVEMENT.

A very admirable little guide-book for the use of English-speaking visitors to Hakone has been produced by the combined enterprise of Mr. T. Matsui, proprietor of the inn called Yenshu-ya in Hakone, and the linguistic ability of Mr. C. T. Tauchiya, a gentlemen who seems to have been educated at Cambridge. It is called "Guide on Hakone," a title subtly devised to prepare the reader for the exceptionally attractive style in which the book is composed. The author says that Mr. Matsui "earnestly requested me to translate a book titled Kanzanshi into English that is generally spoken by the most of foreigners," which task he has faithfully accomplished. He appears to suggest some doubt as to the success of his rendering, for he says:—"I am afraid that the natural beauty of the place should be left out of my pages." But we venture to assure Mr. Tsuchiya that his success is quite phenomenal; that his book will greatly enhance the pleasures of Hakone for visitors, and that, having carefully perused his pages, we can frankly say of them, as he himself says of the Yanahanasawa spa, "telescopic viewing off all sides is very excellent." As rights are not reserved—an unwise exercise of liberality in our opinion—we transcribe a few extracts for the benefit of readers who may not have ready access to this remarkable volume:—

YENSHUYA HOTEL,
HAKONE.

FIRST CLASS ACCOMMODATION.
Fine Views of Fuji Mountain and Ashi Lake.

It would be most convenient in March or in April to contract of lending room during the summer days of that year. To those who shall stay at Miyanoshita and practice a recreative excursion to Hakone, this Hotel may serve for reposing place to dine.

RIHEI MATSUI.

Hakone, June 28th, 1898.

1.—GENERAL REPORTS ON HAKONE.

For the most part, the celebrated places and the famous ruins preserve mostly in steep and unapproachable points, as in precipices or valleys. Here, the most steep and precipitous point in Tōkaidō is Hakone Mountain, to whose summit we can reach after ascending about ten miles from its either base. Owing to toilsome ascent, many difficulties must be endured by travellers. The result of toleration is pleasure. There the Imperial Pleasure Palace stands; Hakone Gongen, a Shintō temple, adorns itself with perpetual unchanging dress of forest; the Ashi lake spreads the face of glowing glass reflected upside down the shadow of Fuji, which is the highest, noblest, and most glorious mountain in Japan; and the mineral hot-springs warmly entertain the guests coming yearly to visit them during summer vacation. The purity of air, the coolness of summer days, and the fine view of landscape are agreeable to all visitors; for these facts, they do not know how is the summer heat and where is the epidemic prevailing.

II. INHABITANTS.—Although the village has not so much population, the degree of livelihood of the inhabitants is comparatively excellent. Their natural disposition is gentle and honest, and their mutual friendship is so harmonious as that of a family.

III. AIR.—Draught of pure air suspends no poisonous mixture and always cleanses the defilement of our spirit. During the winter days the coldness robs up all pleasures from our hands, but at the summer months they are set free.

IV. VIEWS.—Whenever we visit the place, the first pleasure to be longed is the view of Fuji Mountain and its summit is covered with permanent undissolving snow, and its regular configuration, hanging down the sky like an opened white fan, may be looked long at equal shape from several regions surrounding it. Every one who saw it ever has nothing but applause. It casts the shadow in a contrary direction on still glassy face of lake as I have just described. Buildings of Imperial Solitary Palace, scenery of Gongen, all are spontaneous pictures. Wind proper in quantity suits to our boat to slip by sail, and moonlight shining on the sky shivers quartzy lustre over ripples of the lake. The cuckoo singing near by our hotel plays on a harp, and the gulls flying about to and fro seek their food in the waves. All these panorama may be gathered only in this place.

There is a narration now remained about the name Oidara which I will tell you a little. At an ancient period, a youth called Urashima Taro ever passed here, and rested himself from his labour. Within his baggages, he had a box which he was left from his wife with whom he had lived happily, and which he was strictly decreed never to open whatever be the case and that if it be opposed he will become old. But he forgot of his wife's decretive words. He opened the box. The lid was cast into front mountain and the box into hind mountain. Suddenly his face wrinkled, his beard became white, his loins bent as shrimp, and all blessings disappeared at once. On that account, mountain to which he cast the box was called Banko-yama, which Japanese means "Mountain of box," and that of the lid was called Futago-yama, of which pronunciation is in like sound with "lid" in Japanese, and this flat place was named Oidara as I have just spoken.

Westward.—After ascending about a mile westward from Hakone-machi, we shall reach to a post erected to mark the boundary of Sagami, to which Hakone belongs, and Idzu, which belongs to Shidzuoka-ken. The more we go forward the lower the ground becomes. Soon we shall arrive at Segyodaira or Settai, where in former ages the horses passing through this place received bestowment of the bean, but at the present time the alms of tea are given to every one who travels on this mountain instead of giving compassion to horses.

Mishima is a small town busy of one's own occupation, and there may be the perfect convenience of all wants desired for.

Hotels.—Forty-five houses among whole machi are the hotels for cessation of travellers. Each of them as an untiring view of garden and an elegant prospect of landscape; hence many visitors are assembled at the summer days to attend their own health. The chief hotels are Ishiuchi, Yamakiya, and Yenshuya.

Victuals.—Breads, fleshes of fowls and animals, and fresh fishes transporting on from Yoshihama and Fukuura satisfy the relish of people.

Water to be drunk.—Streams of water issuing forth in the south-eastern valley of Hakone-machi, are used by whole inhabitants. Transport and delicate liquid is constantly overflowing from the vat and its pulmy free from defilement so finely values on the applause of visitors as it is with the air.

There were fifty lodging places from Tōkyō to Kyōto in the public road called Tōkaidō. One of them is Hakone. An ancient state about this place is scarcely known to the world, even to its own dwellers, but since the middle ages there were the abundant records and stories remained, which I will talk a little.

Frequently, the violent wars were battled here in ancient times. I will only describe the latest battle struggled at Hakone. At May of the first year of Meiji about thirty years ago from the present, two feudal and military chiefs engaged in battle on Hakone mountain. One of them was Ohubo Kagano-kami, the Lord of Odawara Han, and other Shōgosuke Hayashi, Lord of Bōshū; and the former belonged to Imperial army and the latter was in Shōgun's side. One time, Hayashi staid at Numadzu and held a good many soldiers. Leading them, he passed Mishima and came to Hakone. He requested to the guardsmen of Barrier-gate to let his army pass through it. At that time, the guardianship of the gate was in the hand of Odawara-Han, and the request was not permitted by its master Kagano-kami. He durst to pass through it by military power. Then the battle was instigated, and instantly guns were fired. All of dwellers of Hakone were so frightened that they fled out of their dwellings and hid into mountains or valleys. After short struggle the guardsmen could not conquer him, and retired to Odawara to shut themselves up in the castle for its defence. Taking advantage of victory, he advanced his army to destroy them. He missed unexpectedly his cogitation. He was defeated very badly, and retired to Yumoto. Secondly, he ran back to Hakone, defeated by enemy. By violent pursuit of Imperial army, he was finally obliged to run to Atiro, about four miles south from Atami and thence to escape to his own previous dominion.

Thenceforth, the construction of perfect Imperial government by the revolution of Meiji placed the nation out of impetuous struggles of Feudalism. And this ruin was remained to endless fancy.

The old withered cedar-trees about two or three feet in diameter sink vertically or transversally on the bottom of the lake. Why are they immerging to the lake? A slight research will easily give you a reason.

KOREAN NOTES.

We recently quoted an extract from the annual report of the British Consul-General in Korea to the effect that there were no beggars in the little peninsula empire, save in the foreign quarters of Söul; yet to-day we find the Independent devoting a leading article to the subject of "What shall we do with Beggars." From this article we learn there are hundreds of beggars in Korea; "that they are a privileged class: that they do not beg but demand; that they visit rice stores, vegetable shops, etc., periodically and help themselves to what they want; that they are more insolent than a millionaire, but nobody dares offend them; and that in some parts of the country people are in as much awe of beggars as of Imperial inspectors." This anomaly, says our contemporary, is explained by the fact "that beggars, thieves, and robbers are too often convertible terms, and that a brigade of beggars was formerly employed by the prison authorities when a particularly nasty job had to be done." The Independent describes the Korean beggar as a sturdy fellow who "wants the chain, not charity."

The Vice-President of the Imperial Peddlers' Guild in Korea, Yi Knidong, has been elevated to the judicial bench, being made Chief of the Bureau of Civil Cases.

It costs something to dress well in Korea. Our Söul contemporary estimates that the hat, hair-band, cap, etc., of a Korean gentleman run up to nearly $200. The items are:—

Silk hat	$ 20
Cap	20
Hair band	5
Hat stopper	40
Topknot pin	10
Hat string	50
Pair of solid gold buttons	50
	$ 195

Korea is being impelled slowly along the path of reform. Recently the Vice-President of the Council of State made the following suggestions to the Ministers:—

1. That officers in various Departments should hold their respective positions until sickness or bad behaviour necessitated their removal.

2. That the decisions of one Minister of Justice should not be reversed by his successor without sufficient reasons being adduced; but that in case of an unjust decision the Minister might be impeached.

3. That the special nightly frequenters (whisperers) at the Court should be kept out of the Palace.

4. That proper steps be taken at once to root out the growing opium habit.

On the 13th of August, Kim Pyengsi, the oft-resigning Premier, had his wish gratified, the Emperor accepting his resignation.

The Independence Club having expostulated with the chief of the Supreme Court at the delay in bringing Yi Yongik to trial, the Minister of Justice replied:—

"The case of Yi Yongik—can your Club alone be indignant against it? The legal authorities will never rest until he be brought to justice. Since the Imperial sanction was obtained and the police instructed for his arrest, many days have passed (in vain search for him). May it not be that he has run away? Moreover, Yi Yongik, in close alliance with Choi Jungsik (the man who was some time ago imprisoned for having employed impolite language against His Majesty) manufactured cunning fables trying to exonerate himself (Yi) by throwing all blame of his misdeeds on His Majesty. These facts having come to the light unreserved, Yi had added crime upon crime. He ought to be punished without a day's indulgence. We are twice as impatient and indignant at this delay of the trial as you. I hope this is a satisfactory reply to your inquiries.

Five of the twelve men arrested in connection with the recent "conspiracy"—they suggested that the Emperor should resign in favour of the Crown Prince—have been acquitted. The other seven, Messrs. Yi Choongku, and Kim Jaipoong, two ex-Commissioners of Police, Yi Jongnim, ex Chief of Police, Yi Rionghau and Yi Yonghan, two ex-Army officers, and Yi Johyen, ex-Magistrate of Keujei, were all sentenced to banishment for life.

The latest intelligence from Korea published in the Kokumin confirms the rumour that the German Minister in Sŏul has applied to the Korean Government for permission to allow a German concessionaire to build a railway between Sŏul and Wonsan. The German Consul-General approached the Korean Court on the 8th or 9th ultimo.

On the 4th ultimo the Japanese Minister submitted a proposal to the Korean Government that the detailed provisions in regard to the Sŏul-Fusan railway should be settled in accordance with the provisional treaty. No definite reply, however, has been received, though the Minister has frequently repaired to the Foreign and Home Offices m bring the matter to a speedy conclusion.

On the night of the 16th instant a communication is said to have been suddenly despatched by the Chinese Consul in Sŏul to the Korean Government, proposing that a treaty of alliance might be concluded between the two countries. The Sŏul Government is not likely to reject the proposal, and it is said that the Minister of War will shortly be despatched to Peking as a special Ambassador. Nevertheless, whether this Ambassador is to be sent with the sole object of making the formal announcement of the independence of Korea or to negotiate for the conclusion of a friendly treaty in the capacity of Envoy Extraordinary, is not yet definitely known.

On the report of the Minister of Justice on the 8th instant, a warrant for the arrest of Yi Yong-ik, ex-Superintendent of Mines, was issued, but he had absconded.

The Imperial Peddlers' Association now numbers 2,800 members. President Chong Ruk-yong having resigned, his post has been temporarily occupied by the Vice-president Li Kui-tong, who was recently appointed Director of the Civil Bureau of the Judicial Department. The Association has for its object the improvement of industry and commerce. It claims to be free from political connection, and denies that it was organised to oppose the Independence Club.

Chhoi Sok-cho, of the Finance Department, was recently appointed Inspector General of Railways and Director of the Minting Bureau. He has manufactured a vast number of nickel coins bearing the inscription "505 years since the opening of the country." It has been determined that the Mint, hitherto established in Inchhon, shall be removed to the neighbourhood of the Ryong Sansŏng Castle.

CHINESE NEWS.

A hot wave seems to have visited Hankow during the middle of August. On the 17th ult. the thermometer in the captain's cabin of the Kiangfoo registered 101°, and on deck it stood at 134°. To add to the physical discomforts of the officers and crew, a large lighter loaded with kerosene caught fire and drifted down by the Kiangfoo. But the Captain managed to get his unwelcome visitor towed out into the middle of the stream, where it floated harmlessly away.

The Emperor of China has decided to be present at the Palace examinations of new doctors and will give out the themes to be discussed. He has also decided to abolish the fine penmanship test, declaring that caligraphy is but an empty accomplishment.

Shanghai residents have formed a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to animals. There is abundant scope for such a Society in Japan, but we imagine that many years will have to elapse before we shall see one started here. Of late the treatment of horses and bullocks in Yokohama has shown some improvement, for which the police are in a measure to be thanked, but the loads that these patient animals have to pull up the Bluff are still, in the majority of cases, very much too heavy.

"Philo-Coreanus," writing to the N.-C. Daily News from Newchwang, under date August 16th, says:—

Amongst other arrivals at this port I have to notice the Japanese steamer Seitoku Maru from Muroran with a quantity of railway sleepers. This is the first instalment, as I understand, of the plant for the Russian Railway Concession. The vessel arrived last Sunday, the 14th inst., and the managers of the railway, Messrs. Gutschmann and Treff, were very anxious to have the cargo discharged at once, but I suppose the holiness of the day did not allow such extraordinary privileges even to the representatives of the omnipotent Czar.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

It is necessary to record that on the following day the Seitoku Maru steamed to the east of this port and is now discharging her cargo about two miles outside the limits of the port as a place called Takuantun, where a locale has been fixed upon by the managing engineers. Far be it from me to object to what, under the circumstances, appears to be a privilege necessary to the circumstances of the case, for it is only reasonable that those who have received concessions for the building of railways should be allowed to land the material at the most convenient spot, but I would ask whether the great privilege of a steamer proceeding to, and discharging at, a place not allowed by treaty has been granted by the Imperial Maritime Customs, or whether "French leave" has just been taken by the Russian authorities. I hear that when the Commissioner of Customs naturally demurred to allowing a Japanese steamer to discharge outside the limits prescribed by treaty, telegraphic communication at once took place with the Russian Minister at Peking, and this gentleman simply replied: "Do what is necessary with or without permission and throw all responsibility upon me." Don't you think this is rather "tall," or do you suppose the Russian Minister induced the I. G. to authorise his subordinate to do what was asked? I would ask

ANOTHER QUESTION.

Is this privilege to be taken as a precedent, and will Britishers or other nationalities be allowed to land cargo at other places than within the limits of the port? I presume there can be no question about this, in view of the clause in the last treaties generally known as the "Favoured Nation" clause.

The Emily F. Whitney, an American sailing ship, whose rumoured loss, while on a voyage from Shanghai to Hongkong, was reported in the newspapers, has arrived safely at the latter port.

The Peking Field Force has received from the Hang Yang Iron works, 2,000 Mauser rifles and four rapid-fire field pieces and a quantity of ammunition, all made at the Viceroy Chang's factory.

Mr. T. R. Jernigan, late U.S. Consul-General at Shanghai, and formerly of Kobe, has some complimentary remarks to make regarding the Model Settlement, using the Philadelphia Manufacturer as his mouth piece. He says in reference to the way Shanghai is governed:—

"It will be seen that foreigners at Shanghai are well-guarded against incompetent and disinterested persons serving in a branch of their local government entrusted with the supervision of the safety and value of their property; and it may be stated that by the qualification of suffrage and other careful provisions there is no city in the world better governed than Shanghai. Property is secure, and the city prospers because men who own property and who are competent direct the city's policy. With regard to social and educational advantages no city of the East can show those that are superior. Although it is called the Paris of Asia, there can be found nowhere a more cordial and refined hospitality than at Shanghai, and the gentleman and lady and sterling business man, from whatever land they come, receive a friendly welcome and encouragement." The "Paris of Asia" is good: the Indian cities may lower their erstwhile proud crests.

On August 22nd, the Margaret Williamson Hospital, situated near the West Gate of Shang-hai, was partially destroyed by fire. The N.-C. Daily News, in its report of the affair, says:—Dr. Reifsnyder being in Japan and her assistants at Kuling, the hospital is closed, and there was no one on the premises but a boy and a coolie, while in the whole cluster of missionary buildings surrounding the hospital there are only two foreigners at the present time, Miss Kelly and Miss Irvine. The hospital consists of two blocks, one fronting the road, the main building, and one behind, the two being joined by a corridor. A number of Chinese fire brigades succeeded in practically saving the rear building, but the main building was totally destroyed. It is understood that it was insured. The hospital safe was saved.

A correspondent sends the following note to a Shanghai paper:—The Russians have about 25,000 soldiers between Newchwang and Port Arthur. They have landed over a hundred new big guns at Port Arthur and are building up forts, etc., very quickly. A large number of Chinese and Russians are at work on the forts, wharves, etc., at both Port Arthur and Talienwan, whilst the dock at Port Arthur has been enlarged. I saw over two hundred men making canvas tents for the men who have not got houses. Wherever one goes now one finds Russian soldiers all over the country, both on the main road and inland, and surveying for the railway is going on in various places. When the railway is completed Russia, to judge by all appearance, will make another important step forward. They have about thirteen men-of-war now guarding their new acquisitions between Port Arthur and Talienwan.

Our Shanghai morning contemporary guilelessly prints a pretty story that its native correspondent sends from Peking. It runs thus:—

A few days ago some Ministers of the Tsungli Yamên brought before his Majesty the new draft of the credentials to be used by the new Chinese Minister to Korea. His Majesty observed that, following the old usuage when Korea was a vassal of the Crown, the Ministers had elevated the designation "H. I. M. the Emperor of China." (Ta Tsing) three spaces above the characters, "H.R.H. the King of Korea," whereupon the Emperor took up his vermillion pencil and corrected the form by placing the two designations on a level, at the same time remarking: "Korea is independent and no more vassal to us, isn't she? Well then, what's the use of affecting such hollow forms of arrogant pride and pretending an empty superiority over that country? She should be addressed in the same way as other independent countries are addressed. What we require is solid advantage and worth for our country and ourselves. The Sacred Sage (Confucius) himself exhorted us to humility and true worth. What is the use of fighting for such a superiority which amounts to nothing more nor less than paper and ink superiority?"

The Peking and Tientsin Times could not have heard of this little episode or it would not have been at pains to put in print its opinion that "some of the recent Imperial decrees are not worth the paper they are written on."

We find the following note in the N.-C. Daily News with reference to the new Chinese Minister to Tokyo:—

It appears from despatches received from Peking that no less than twenty-three names were handed to the Emperor by Ministers of his Court and officials in the provinces, to choose for the post of Chinese Minister to Japan, chief among whom were Huang Chunhsien, Salt Intendant of Hunan, recommended strongly by Prince Ching; Liang Cheng, a Tsungli Yamen Secretary, recommended by Chang Yinhuan; Chang Hengchia, a Hanlin, recommended by Sun Chia-nai. As Huang Chunhsien possessed, in the Emperor's opinion, the best qualifications for the post, His Majesty at once selected his name. But after a pause, probably recalling the objections made two years ago to Mr. Huang, the Emperor ordered enquiries to be made at the Japanese Legation as to whether Mr. Huang would be a persona grata at the Court of Tokyo. The reply was that Mr. Huang had been very popular nearly twenty years ago when he went as attaché with the first embassy to Japan under Minister Ho, and H.E. Huang Chun-hsien now finds himself at last a Minister Plenipotentiary, which privilege was denied him two years ago, and during which time he has profitably spent in inaugurating important reforms in Hunan and benefiting his country at large.

We (Japan Mail) do not believe, for reasons already given, that any inquiry was addressed to Japan on the subject.

Another Imperial Edict of progressive import appeared on the 22nd August. It stated the Emperor's intention to open schools of Chinese and foreign languages, and attach them to the Chinese legations abroad, for the benefit of the sons of Chinese residents doing business in the countries to which the legations are accredited. The idea is to educate young Chinese staying or born abroad in the literature of their own country, and give the more brilliant ones a change of serving their country when their education in foreign countries shall have been completed. It is to be hoped, remarks the N.-C. Daily News, that the Government will not treat these young men as shabbily and scurvily as those educated some years ago abroad were treated, owing to a fear that the returned students "knew too much and were therefore more foreign than Chinese."

Dr. Griffith John, the veteran missionary, informs the Shanghai journals that Hengchowfu is being deluged with anti-foreign placards. A public letter has also been addressed by Chou Han's notorious clique, in which reference to the recent doings of Japan, Russia, Germany, France, and Great Britain are alluded to. The most outrageous statements are made in this letter, as might only be expected.

The floods around Chunking are said to be the worst for 29 years past.

A disused palace at Peking is to be fitted up as an Imperial Hotel for the reception of distinguished strangers, under the superintendence of Prince Ching and H.E. Li Hung-chang.

Rear-Admiral Stark has been appointed Commandant of Port Arthur. Col. Kholodowsky is to command the artillery at Port Arthur and Talienwan.

The P. & T. Times says the Russians have determined that the new dockyards at Port Arthur shall be the largest in the Far East, and eclipse anything possessed by Japan. They have also changed the name of Port Arthur to Ni-ku-la-wen—a name which, we believe, is intended to signify the valour of the present proprietors.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Wednesday was the birthday of the Queen of the Netherlands, and the Dutch residents of Yokohama displayed decorations in honour of the event.

Early on Tuesday morning a young couple, apparently about 21 years old, committed suicide by lying on the rail near Tsurumi Station before an up train on the Tokaido line.

The Shogyo says Mr. Nakamura Yaroku has been selected as the successor to Mr. Yamada, Vice-Minister of Education, and on the 29th ultimo application was made for the sanction of His Majesty to the appointment.

A man named Hayashi Jin, aged 24, living at Matsuya-cho, Kyobashi, Tokyo, was arrested on the 29th ult. by the Tokyo Police on a charge of having stolen two gold vases, valued at over yen 1,000, from the Catholic Church, No. 80 Settlement, Tokyo.

The Japanese were the only nation represented by a military attaché during the operations of the U.S. army against Manila. Captain Long, A.S.C., D.A.A.G.B., of the Headquarters' Staff, Hongkong, was present in an unofficial capacity, says the China Mail, and was exceedingly popular with the American officers.

The American loss at the capture of Manila amounted to forty-six killed and about one hundred wounded, the Spanish casualties being approximately two hundred killed and one hundred wounded. There was practically no damage done to the town and no noncombatants were injured during the bombardment.

Early on the morning of the 27th a robber armed with a sword entered the house of a pawn-broker named Awoyagi, living at Suwa-cho, Koishikawa, Tokyo. He tied up three employés who were sleeping in the office, and demanded where the money was kept, menacing them with the sword. Another employé who was sleeping in the next room got up and informed the police, but before they arrived the man had left.

A most singular will suit has just terminated in England. Dr. Kingsbury, the plaintiff, was left £30,000 by an affectionate and lucrative patient, Mrs. Howard, and it was alleged that this was obtained by the exercise of undue influence over the testatrix. The theory of the defence was that Mrs. Howard had, while in a hypnotic state, received suggestions from Dr. Kingsbury which had induced her to make the will. The Jury found, however, that no such influence was used.

With the exception of a number of cases of typhoid fever and measles contracted on board ship, the health of the U.S. troops at Cavite and Manila was excellent at date of latest advices, but it is possible, as the China Mail observes, now that the exciting work of the trenches is over, that climatic diseases will begin to show themselves. In the brigade hospital at Camp Dewey, there were no patients except those suffering from gunshot wounds, a remarkably good record. The splendid physique of the men and the plentiful supply of good food were mainly responsible for this satisfactory state of affairs.

In France the pampering of prisoners seems to be carried to a great extent. At Fresnes-Rungis, the other day, what is described as a "lovely new prison" was opened with many signs of rejoicing. A number of officials on electric motors, decorated with flowers and tricolours, took part in the cheerful ceremony. The new gaol, if what is much more like a very decent hotel can be so described, is a substitute for Mazas, La Roquette, and St. Pélagie, and is lighted by electricity, well supplied with cold water, electric bells to call warders, and gardens for exercise. It is sad to think that the accommodation must be limited to 2,150.

The twin screw liner Hongkong Maru was successfully launched on 7th July from the shipyard of Sir James Laing at Sunderland. The vessel has been built to the order of the Tokyo Kisen Kabushiki Kaisha. She is the second ship built by Sir James Laing for that company, and is intended for fast passenger and cargo service between China, Japan, and the United States. Her dimensions are:—Length, 431ft.; breadth, 50ft. 6in.; depth moulded to upper deck, 32ft. 6in. The vessel has been constructed of steel throughout to Lloyd's highest class, as well as to the rules of the Japanese Government and the British Board of Trade. Accommodation has been provided for a large number of first-class and second-class passengers, and about 250 emigrants. The first-class accommodation consists of special suites, a luxurious saloon capable of seating all the first-class passengers at one time, spacious social hall, and tastefully decorated ladies' and smoking-rooms. The second-class passengers are also accommodated in a similar manner. Electric light has been fitted throughout, and ample and efficient ventilation is arranged for, as well as a complete system of heating during the cold weather. There is space in the holds for about 5,000 tons of cargo. The engines, which are built by Messrs. George Clark (Limited), of Sunderland, have been designed with a view to the high speed on service of nearly 17 knots, and have cylinders 28½in., 46 in., and 75in. in diameter, with a stroke of 48in., taking steam from four double-ended and one single-ended boilers.

THE FALL OF MANILA.

From later despatches to hand by the English mail, we learn that Captain-General Augustin had been superseded at Manila by General Firmin Jaudenes Alvares eight days before the American ultimatum was delivered. He was deposed by telegram from Madrid, but waited till the last moment, however, before quitting Manila: when the first shot was fired he boarded the German steam-launch en route for the Kaiserin Augusta.

The U.S. ultimatum ran as follows:—

To the General-in-Chief commanding the Spanish Forces in Manila.

Manila Bay, August 7, 1898.

SIR,—We have the honour to notify your Excellency that operations of the land and naval forces of the United States against the defences of Manila may begin at any time after the expiration of 48 hours from the hour of receipt by you of this communication, or sooner if made necessary by an attack on your part. This notice is given to afford you an opportunity to remove all non-combatants from the city.—Very respectfully,

(Signed) WESLEY MERRITT,
Major-General, U.S.A., Commanding Land Forces of the United States.

GEORGE DEWEY,
Rear-Admiral, U.S. Navy, Commanding U.S. Naval Forces on Asiatic Station.

The reply ran:—

To the Major-General of the Army and the Rear-Admiral of the Naval Forces of the United States.

Manila, August 7, 1898.

GENTLEMEN,—I have the honour to inform your Excellencies that at half-past twelve o'clock I received the notice with which you favoured me, that after 48 hours have elapsed you may begin operations against this fortified city or at an earlier hour if the forces under your command are attacked by mine.

As your notice is sent for the purpose of providing for the safety of non-combatants, I give thanks to your Excellencies for the humane sentiments you have shown, and state that finding myself surrounded by insurrectionary forces I am without a place of refuge for the increased number of wounded, sick, women and children who are now within the walls.—Respectfully and kissing the hands of of your Excellencies,

(Signed) FERMIN JAUDENES,
Governor-General and Captain-General of the Philippines.

The letter was carried into the city by Lieut. Armitage, of H.M.S. Immortalité.

The foreign war-ships after this began to move out of the way, the German, French and other European nationalities going over to the north side of the Bay, the British and Japanese coming over to the erstwhile American anchorage. As the four British war-vessels steamed across, the Immortalité leading the others in line, and when the senior ship was about two ships' lengths off, the band of the Olympia played "God Save the Queen," and the band of the Immortalité responded with "The Star Spangled Banner." It was a common, every-day act of courtesy, but it is immensely appreciated by the Americans who witnessed it. Sir Edward Chichester, the typical bluff old English seaman, has won a warm place in American regard for his behaviour during the war. The foreign residents of Manila, British, German, Chinese, etc., took refuge on ships in the Bay, the two English Bank managers being the last to leave. Capt. Long, of the British A.S.C., and a Japanese military officer were the only foreign attachés with the American army.

General Merritt on August 9th issued the followed General Orders, No. 3:—

In view of the extraordinary conditions under which this Army is operating, the Commanding General desires to acquaint the officers and men composing it with the expectations he entertains as to their conduct.

You are assembled upon foreign soil situated within the western confines of a vast ocean separating you from native land. You have come not as despoilers and oppressors, but simply as the instruments of a liberal and powerful government whose purposes are beneficent, and which has declared itself, in this war, the champion of those oppressed by Spanish misrule.

It is therefore the intention of this order to appeal directly to your pride in your position as representatives of a high civilisation, in the hope and with the firm conviction, that you will so conduct yourselves in your relations with the inhabitants of these islands, as to convince them of the lofty nature of the mission which you come to execute.

It is not believed that any acts of pillage, rapine or violence will be committed by soldiers or others in the employ of the United States, but should there be persons with this command who prove themselves unworthy of this confidence, their acts will be considered not only as crimes against the sufferers, but as direct insults to the United States flag, and they will be punished on the spot with the maximum penalties known to military law.

By Command of Major-General Merritt,
J. B. Babcock,
Adjutant General.

Father William D. McKinnon, Chaplain of the 1st California Volunteers on August 10th entered Manila absolutely alone, bent on persuading the Archbishop to sanction a surrender. He entered the palace of Archbishop Nozaleda, where he was cordially received. The Archbishop informed Father McKinnon that he was and had always been most earnest in his wishes for the restoration of peace between Spain and the United States, and would do all in his power to secure a cessation of hostilities. The Archbishop did not think, however, that it would be possible to secure the surrender of Manila without a fight. The Spaniards in the city were suffering greatly from lack of food, were in fact starving, nevertheless he did not believe the Governor General would give up without making a last desperate effort. The Archbishop denied most emphatically the authorship of the circular ascribed to him in which the Spaniards are called upon to resist the Yankee invaders to the last drop of blood. As a man of God, he said, he could not have given utterance to sentiments like these. He was an apostle of peace, always. The Archbishop bade Father McKinnon a cordial adieu, and placed his carriage at his visitor's disposal for a visit to the Governor-General. Governor Firmen Jaudenes Alvarez, whom Father McKinnon describes as a small man, not of imposing presence, was also most cordial. His talk was less peaceable than the Archbishop's, as became a soldier. Manila, he said, would not be given up without a struggle. He had received Admiral Dewey and General Merritt's notification that the city would be bombarded, and the Spanish flag still flew. If the Americans wanted the city they must take it.

In the opinion of the China Mail, Father McKinnon performed by this daring act one of the most remarkable feats in the annals of foreign warfare.

At a quarter to nine o'clock, on August 13th, the American fleet got under way. At nine o'clock, flags were sent to masthead, and shaken out in the morning breeze. The Monterey seemed to be leading the way, the other vessels standing by and watching the marine monster get into position; but it was soon apparent that the Monterey, Charleston, Baltimore, Boston, and Concord were not going into action, being held as supports, and the Olympia, as became the noble flagship, lead the fighting line. At 9.35, the Olympia sent some 4 inch shells hurtling through the air in the direction of the Malate fort, called San Antonio de Abad. All fell short, a heavy rain squall making it difficult to judge distances or to observe the result of the firing. The Petrel now came up and fired into the fort, followed by the Raleigh. Meanwhile the captured gunboat Callao and the steam-launch Barcelo were careering over the surf close inshore, and as soon as she got within range the plucky little Callao banged away like a little spitfire with her small calibre guns. Most of the firing were done at between 3,000 and 4,000 yards, and the practice of the big ships was excellent after the distance had been determined, most of the 5 in. shells falling inside the battery or the earthworks. The Olympia fired sixty-nine 5-inch shells and sixteen 8-inch shells, and the Raleigh and the Petrel must have fired about as many, although the Petrel's battery gave trouble for a short time. It was a pretty sight to see the Callao (Lieut. Tappan commanding) and the Barcelo riding through the breakers, pouring a hail of small shell into the Spanish riflemen, who replied, striking the Callao but doing no damage.

A general signal to cease firing was hoisted at 10.32, and shortly after the American infantry could be seen advancing upon the Spanish entrenchments under cover of the fire of the Utah battery. The troops advanced along the beach and the Calle Real, with colours flying and bands playing inspiriting tunes, and after fording the little creek in front of the Spanish position the troops deployed in skirmishing order along Malate, keeping up a heavy musketry fire and finally halting on the Luneta. The resistance of the Spanish troops was very stubborn at first for a nominal defence. About twelve o'clock Flag-Lieutenant Brumby went ashore in the Belgian Consul's launch, accompanied by Inspector-General Whittier, of General Merritt's staff. An interview with Capt.-General Jaudenes resulted in an agreement upon the draft terms of capitulation. General Merritt then went ashore with Lieutenant Brumby to settle the terms. Considerable difficulty was experienced in finding General Jaudenes, who was ultimately discovered in the sacristy of one of the churches filled with women and children. Lieut. Brumby had to speak somewhat sharply to several Spanish officers before the whereabouts of Jaudenes was revealed.

Immediately after the capitulation was signed, Lieutenant Brumby went out to lower the Spanish flag, accompanied by two signalmen from the Olympia. After considerable difficulty he found his way into Fort Santiago in the northern portion of the walled city where there had been a large Spanish flag flying all day. Many Spanish officers were grouped around, and Lieutenant Brumby's presence had attracted a crowd from the streets. As he approached to haul down the yellow and red banner he was hissed by the crowd, and when the Stars and Stripes were raised many in the crowd wept bitterly. Fearing the crowd might lower the flag, Lieutenant Brumby asked an American infantry officer who came along to bring his detachment as a guard. Fortunately, the officer met a company of infantry with their band, and brought them along, the company presenting arms while the band played "The Star-Spangled Banner," thus giving a touch of eclat to the ceremony.

The conduct of the Spaniards after the capitulation was disgraceful. In regard to the preservation of public property they committed actual breaches of faith, says the China Mail—to which we are indebted for these details. They brought down the river the gunboat Cebu, flying the Spanish flag, and deliberately set her on fire at the mouth of the Pasig. A party of Americans boarded her, and hoisting the American flag endeavoured to save the vessel, but their efforts were fruitless, and to-day the scorched hulk lies there as a monument to Spanish duplicity. They did not stop at this. At least three launches and a large number of boats and cars were destroyed along the banks of the river. Landing shortly after General Merritt, I was one of the first to traverse the walled city. We found the civil inhabitants and soldiers looking remarkably well for reputedly starving people. It was well capitulation was agreed to, however, for a bombardment of the city would have entailed severe loss of life among the women and other non-combatants.

The American troops quickly occupied the city on both sides of the Pasig, sleeping on the principal streets throughout a wet night. The conduct of the American troops, officers and men alike, was beyond praise; it was simply admirable. They had not been inside Binondo an hour before they were fraternising good humouredly with the Spaniards and natives, and one group of Regulars squatted in the Escolta and edified the crowd for quite a long time with tuneful plantation ditties and stories.

A correspondent of the China Mail with the troops, speaks highly of the way in which they were handled, mentioning particularly the destructive fire of the four guns of the Utah battery, the dashing charge of the Colorado Regiment, and the sweeping advance of the Californian Regiment. General Merritt entered the walled city at 3 o'clock and fighting then ceased everywhere. The capitulation was formally signed by the Spanish Commissioners, Colonels Don José Maria Olaguen Telin and Don Carlos Reye Rich and General Don Nicholas de la Pena y Cuellas; the American Commissioners being General Greene, General Whittier, Colonel Crowder, Judge Advocate, and Captain Lamberton, of the Olympia.

GENERAL MERRITT'S PROCLAMATION.

The following, says the Daily Press, is a proclamation issued by General Merritt in Spanish, English, and Tagalo:—

Headquarters Department of the Pacific.
August 14th, 1898.

To the People of the Philippines:

I.—War has existed between the United States and Spain since April 21st of this year. Since that date you have witnessed the destruction, by an American fleet, of the Spanish naval power in these islands, the fall of the principal city, Manila, and its defences, and the surrender of the Spanish Army of occupation to the forces of the United States.

II.—The Commander of the United States forces now in possession has instructions from his Government to assure the people that he has not come to wage war upon them, nor upon any part or faction among them, but to protect them in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All persons who, by active aid or honest submission, co-operate with the United in its efforts to give effect to this beneficent purpose, will receive the reward of its support and protection."

III.—The government established among you by the United States is a government of military occupation; and for the present it is ordered that the municipal laws such as affect private rights of persons and property, regulate local institutions, and provide for the punishment of crime, shall be considered as continuing in force, so far as compatible with the purposes of military government, and that they be administered through the ordinary tribunals substantially as before occupation, but by officials appointed by the government of occupation.

IV.—A Provost Marshal-General will be appointed for the City of Manila and its outlying districts. This territory will be divided into sub-districts and there will be assigned to each a deputy Provost Marshal.

The duties of the Provost Marshal-General and his deputies will be set forth in detail in future orders. In a general way they are charged with the duty of making arrests of military as well as civil offenders, sending such of the former class as are triable by courts martial to their proper commands with statements of their offences and names of witnesses and detaining in custody all other offenders for trial by military commission, provost courts, or native criminal courts, in accordance with law, and the instructions hereafter to be issued.

V.—The port of Manila, and all other ports and places in the Philippines, which may be in the actual possession of our land and naval forces, will be open while our military occupation may continue to the commerce of all neutral nations as well as our own, in articles not contraband of war, and upon payment of the prescribed rates of duty which may be in force at the time of the importation.

VI.—All churches and places devoted to religious worship, and to the arts and sciences, all educational institutions, libraries, scientific collections, museums, are, so far as possible, to be protected; and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places or property, of historical monuments, archives, or works of science and art is prohibited, save when required by urgent military necessity. Severe punishment will be meted out for all violations of this regulation.

The custodians of all property of the character mentioned in this section will make prompt returns thereof to these headquarters stating character and location, from embodying such recommendations as they may think proper for the full protection of the properties under their care and custody, that proper orders may issue enjoining the co-operation of both military and civil authorities in securing such protection.

VII.—The Commanding General, in announcing the establishment of military government and in entering upon his duty as Military Governor, in pursuance of his appointment as such by the Government of the United States, desires to assure the people that so long as they preserve the peace and perform their duties towards the representatives of the United States, they will not be disturbed in their persons and property, except in so far as may be found necessary for the good of the service of the United States, and the benefit of the people of the Philippines.

WESLEY MERRITT,
Major-General U. S. Army Commanding.

PROCLAMATION BY GENERAL JAUDENES.

EJERCITO Y CAPITANIA GENERAL DE FILIPINAS.

Manila, 14th August, 1898.

Soldiers, Sailors, and Volunteers.—Your unfaltering courage during the long siege and more prolonged blockade of this place entitles you not only to the gratitude of your country, but also to the respect and consideration of the American army, as eloquently witnessed in the honorable capitulation agreed upon yesterday and formulated to-day, of which a copy is annexed.

By this you are conceded, including your banners, all the honours of war; so much for our inevitable permanency in the ungrateful country defended. And liberty and the return of the arms only temporarily deposited being expressly agreed upon as essential conditions of the aforesaid honours, we will be treated as prisoners only as if we on duty.

I trust that your good sense and prudence will as always maintain the discipline you have hitherto displayed, affording no opportunity either to natives or foreigners to observe neglects that might call for repression.

All this will serve as an alleviation of the misfortune which with you is deplored by your General-in-Chief, JAUDENES.

London, Aug. 30.

By order of the Czar, a Note has been issued declaring Russia's desire for the maintenance of peace, and pointing to the reduction of the excessive armaments now crushing all nations as the ideal for which all Governments ought to strive. 27 K x R	Q Kt6 ch	35 B B7	B B4
28 K B sq	Q B6 ch	56 Resigns.

NOTES.

(a) B to K 2 should be played, especially so in this case. It will be seen that in the manner in which White continued he had eventually to dislodge this B, with P to KR 3 and P to KKt 4, ruining his position altogether.

(b) KR to Q sq, and to occupy the QB file with the QR, would be correct here. In the end the KR proved more powerful at KB sq. This, however, is only accidental, as it could not have been foreseen now, except by inspiration.

(c) Intending to close up the Q file, but overlooking Black's ready reply of Kt to Kt 5, attacking the badly placed B at Q 3.

(d) Suicidal, but he has already the inferior game.

(e) The last series of moves were all forced, and so is the text-move to a certain extent, as he feels the necessity of protecting the KRP with R to KR sq.

(f) Perhaps he might have tried to get rid of Black's powerful KB with 23—Kt to B 4 at once.

(g) Opening the KB file gives Black the opportunity of the following brilliancy. Kt to B 4 would still have been comparatively better.

(h) This powerful sacrifice, leading to a forced win, entitles this game to compete with a fair chance of success for the brilliancy prize. The sacrifice is perfectly sound.

(i) The repetition of moves enables Black to gain time for this final manœuvre.

(j) If Q to ■ sq, then P to K 7;—35 Q takes Q. P to K 8 (Q) ch, and wins. The ending is full of beautiful variations, which we leave the reader to examine. Black wins by force.—Field.

GAME No. 427.

There is very little to note, says the Singapore Press, with regard to the consultation tournament, several games having been put off by mutual arrangement or through the inability of some of the players to attend. The surprising event of the past week has been the defeat of Messrs. P. McIntyre and L. M. Cordeiro by Dr. Stephens and Mr. G. Reutens, who after a series of bad luck, suddenly made a good stand and won one of the best played games of the tournament. The game is as follows:—

ZUKERTORT OPENING.

White—Stephens and G. Reutens.	Black—McIntyre and Cordeiro.
BLACK.	WHITE.

31—R takes R	31—Q takes R
32—B takes P	32—R to QKt 5
33—B to Q 6 ch	33—Resigns.

NOTES.

(a) This opening, which bears the name of the famous chess-player, the late Dr. Zukertort, now develops into a Queen's Gambit Declined, in which the early advance of the Pawn to B 5 is considered inadvisable. The usual move is Kt to ■ 3.

(b) Although this must leave White with an isolated Pawn, the exchange is not favourable for Black as it leaves White with two Bishops strongly posted for offence and defence.

(c) QKt to Q 2 is better.

(d) A sad mistake. Q takes P ch should have been played.

(e) If Kt takes R, then Kt takes B ch.

(f) If K to R sq, mate would follow in three moves.

NOTES.

Teichmann won the eighth and ninth games of his match with Lee, and this terminated the contest in his favour, the final score being Teichmann 3, Lee 1, and 5 drawn.

It is said that the following is Mr. Amos Burn's method of making ready to enter on the play of a match game. First of all he disposes on the left side of the chess-board "a small row of well-selected, well-cleaned, and well-seasoned briar-root pipes." Then he places beside them a knife with 17 blades, a pipe-cleaner, a corkscrew, and a bootjack. Next he arranges, in convenient positions, a supply of matches and a tin of Navy cut tobacco and a spittoon; and now, having satisfied himself by sundry inspections that everything is as he would have it, he heaves a sigh of placid contentment, and is ready to open with 1—P to Q 4. When other men with blocked pipes rage furiously together and pervade the precincts in quest of someone who has a wire, Mr. Burn calmly takes his second pipe, or his third, as the case may be. When other men are distracted because of lack of matches Mr. Burn has them at his elbow, together with every other appliance and appurtenance which he requires for playing chess with comfort.—Australasian.

It was announced that at the close of the Vienna Congress a masters' tourney was to be held, under the auspices of the German Chess Association, at Cologne, the first prize to be of the value of £50.

The Vienna Tournament without any exception, has been the most closely contested Tournament that the world has seen. For many rounds, Pillsbury and Tarrasch have kept within a half a point of each other, never more than a point, and finish together. Janowski, the French champion, who takes third prize, exhibited an ability which marks him as one of the world's great players. He defeated, in successive rounds, Pillsbury, Tschigorin, Schiffers, Tarrasch, Alapin, and Walbrodt. He is a dashing player, always dangerous, and fights as long as there is a shade of a chance.

The judges decided that Pillsbury and Tarrasch should play a match of four games to decide who should take first and second prizes. Tarrasch won the first and third games, Pillsbury the second, and the fourth was drawn. The final score was; Tarrasch, 2½; Pillsbury, 1½. Tarrasch receives first prize, $1,500; Pillsbury, second, $1,000 (gold).

HENRY N. PILLSBURY.

Pillsbury will be twenty-six in December. He became famous as the winner of the First Prize at the Hastings Tournament, defeating the World's Champion. Since then, he has defeated Showalter twice for the championship of the United States, and now adds to his laurels by his great fight with Dr. Tarrasch.

DR. SIEGBERT TARRASCH.

Dr. Tarrasch is just ten years older than Pillsbury, and is a native of Breslau. When only sixteen years of age he was a good chess-player, and exhibited extraordinary intellectual endowments. In 1883, being twenty three years of age, he took his degree in medicine. In 1884, took first prize and secured title of Master in Nuremberg. In 1885 played in the Hamburg Chess-Congress, in which he showed great skill and tied with Blackburne, English, Mason, and Weiss for second place. The five scored 11½ points against Gunsberg, who took first prize with 12 points. Since 1886, Dr. Tarrasch has been a practising physician in Nuremberg; first prize in the Breslau Tournament, 1889; the Manchester Tournament, 1890, and the Tournament in Dresden, 1892; Leipzig, 1894. Dr. Tarrasch has the unique reputation of being the greatest amateur chess-player in the world, for he can not, in any sense, be called a professional. As a player he excels in what may be called chess knowledge. Always analytical, never very brilliant, he plays for a position or combination that gives safety to his game and, at the same time, allows him to force his opponent. This short sketch of the German Doctor would be incomplete if we did not add that he is one of the most genial and gentlemanly players that ever sat at a board.—Literary Digest.

An increase of chess enthusiasm (says the St. James's Budget) has to be recorded in the House of Commons this year. Last year's match between members of the House and reporters of the Press Gallery has this season resolved itself a regular chess contest or tournament, in which eleven players are engaged on each side, who play two games with each other, whenever opportunity offers itself. The first contest was won by the champion of the House, the Right Hon. Horace Plunkett, against the oldest chess player of the Gallery, Mr. B. F. Bassy.

Advanced Pawns should be supported from the side of the board and not from the centre. A Queen's Pawn used as a supporting Pawn is especially weak, being open to attack from all sides.

In every tournament certain players are admitted of whom it is well known that they have no chance for any of the prizes. Such players, through accident or misadventure, may perhaps win an odd game from a prominent competitor. The player who meets with the misfortune to lose such a game at once loses the chance for a high prize, and another player, whom perhaps he has defeated, may come in ahead of him, not through his own merit, but simply because his rival had the misfortune to lose a game by accident. This is not a fair result, and the smaller the number of such men in a tournament the better, particularly as a few such isolated wins, while they may flatter their personal vanity, ought to bring them neither increased reputation nor material gain.—St. James's Budget.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

PERSONS suffering from weak or debilitatep constitutions will discover that by the use of this wonderful medicine there is "Health for all." The blood is the fountain of life, and its purity can be maintained by the use of these Pills

Sir Samuel Baker, in his work entitled "The Nile Tributaries in Abyssinia," says—"I ordered the dragoman Mahomet to inform the Fakir that I was a Doctor, and I had the best medicines at the service of the sick, with advice gratis. In I short time I had many applicants, to whom I served out a quantity of Holloway's Pills. These are most useful to an explorer, as, possessing unmistakable purgative properties, they create an undeniable effect upon the patient, which satisfies them of their value."

SIMPLE, SAFE, AND CERTAIN.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT

Is a certain remedy for bad legs, bad breasts, and ulcerations of all kinds. It acts miraculously in healing ulcerations, curing skin diseases, and in arresting and subduing all inflammations.

Mr. J. T. Cooper, in his account of his extraordinary travels in China, published in 1871, says—"I had with me a quantity of Holloway's Ointment. I gave some to the people, and nothing could exceed their gratitude; and, in consequence, milk, fowls, butter, and horse feed poured in upon us, until at last a teaspoonful of Ointment was worth a fowl and any quantity of peas, and the demand became so great that I was obliged to lock up the small remaining "stock."

MR. KOMIYA TSUNEKICHI, Director of the Narita Railway Company, was sued in the Tokyo District Court on the 1st instant for the recovery of yen 35,370 owing to the Kujime Bank. Mr. Akiyama, representing the Bank, applied that the debtor should be declared bankrupt.

The debt of the company, amounting to yen 130,500, will be paid from the new shares and the sale of stock, involving a loss of yen 45,000.

THE French papers accuse the Czar of ignoring the continuous and strenuous preparations of France to recover the lost Provinces (Alsace and Lorraine). It is beginning to be felt that the Czar's manifesto is a grave blow to the Franco-Russian Alliance. President Faure and his Ministers are hastily returning to Paris to deliberate upon the manifesto. The enthusiasm of the German official papers regarding the proposal of reducing armaments has further exasperated France.

FRANCE has been startled by the arrest of Colonel Henry, Chief of the Intelligence Department, who confessed to writing a paper incriminating Dreyfus by name. This paper purported to emanate from a foreign attaché. It was lately read in the Chamber by M. Cavaignac, Minister of War, as positive proof of the guilt of Dreyfus. Colonel Henry committed suicide in prison, cutting his throat with a razor. M. Cavaignac remains convinced of the guilt of Dreyfus, but the clamour for revision of the sentence is increasing. The Cabinet is divided on the question.

THE improvement in trade has come before the setting in of autumn, a hopeful portent. The movement in piece goods, yarns, and grey shirtings, though only slight at present, promises to gather speed ere long, and hopes run high of a good fall trade. The declaration that the new tariff will be enforced from the 1st of next January has also given the market a fillip, for now importers and buyers alike know better how they stand. A better feeling is to be noticed in metals, up-country buyers displaying a gratifying tendency to renew their much depleted stocks. Kerosene, in view of the shortening days, is very firm, and dealers are quite open to offers at current rates. Sugar shows little change, demand being steady with plenty of visible stock. In regard to raw silk, a retrograde movement is reported, demand having fallen off considerably both in the States and Europe. The native buyers are petitioning the Government to grant easier monetary facilities through the Specie Bank, but their success seems doubtful. Raw silk has at last had a turn and over 635 piculs were settled within three weeks. There is a large stock in hand. Tea is beginning to decline in activity and prices are falling in consequence.

TROUBLE IN THE CABINET.

During the past three days, rumours of a Cabinet dissension have been busily circulated in Tokyo, but the accounts published as to the origin of the trouble vary considerably. The version given by the Liberal organs is this:—When the Administrative-Reform Committee met, on the 30th ultimo, the Chief Secretary of the Cabinet, Mr. Taketomi, submitted a proposal in the sense that the salaries of all the high-class political officials—that is to say, the officials whose tenure of office depends on the life of the Cabinet—should be increased. Count Itagaki disapproved of the proposal. His idea is that the salaries of junior officials should be augmented, and those of the upper class left as they are. He refrained, however, from immediately announcing his final opposition and desired that an interval of two days should be taken for reflection. Thereupon Messrs. Oishi, Ozaki, and Taketomi spoke vehemently in favour of the project and against any delay in discussing it, and their attitude offended Count Itagaki so much that he left the meeting.

The version coming from the side of the Progressists is very different. They say that as little time remains for the Committee to formulate its programme, as the public are getting very impatient, some radical and decisive step must be taken at once. Hence the Progressist members of the Committee proposed that a plan should be drawn up for abolishing the Hokkaido Administration Bureau, the Formosa Administration Bureau, the Bureau of Temples and Shrines, and the Bureau of General Business, and for reducing the number of civil officials by one-third. Count Itagaki objected to this scheme. He declared that it was not reform but destruction, and that he could not consent to reduce the staff of the Administration by more than one-fifth.

It will be observed that both stories have the taint of bias. The Liberal version represents the Progressists as having proposed a measure of which the public at large would not be likely to approve, and the Progressist account represents the Liberal leader as opposing a scheme for cutting down administrative expenditures. It is now pretty generally admitted that the emoluments of junior officials are too small. A project for increasing them was framed by the last Ito Cabinet and had the approval of all moderate persons. But there has been no serious suggestion that the salaries paid to high-class officials are insufficient. Hence the unpopular character of the proposal attributed to the Progressist members of Committee is apparent. On the other hand, the four bureaux which the Progressist members are shown as proposing to abolish, all belong to the Home Department, over which Count Itagaki presides. Hence the Progressist version makes Count Itagaki sacrifice general reform on the altar of his own Department's interests, and holds him up as obstructing the large reduction of administrative staff advocated by the Progressists. It is difficult to repose full credit in either version, but there can be no doubt about the fact that some kind of rupture has occurred.

Such are the incidents of the quarrel as seen through the spectacles of the parties to it. If we turn to the opinions expressed about its results, we find a similar divergence of views. The Tokyo Shimbun (Liberal) refrains from entering into details, but is inclined to welcome the occurrence of these storms, inasmuch as they will have the effect of rousing the Cabinet from its inert condition and clearing the atmosphere. Anyone that regards them as the precursors of the Cabinet's overthrow, will find himself mistaken. Their influence will be of the opposite character. The Yomiuri (Progressist) is not so hopeful. After noting that Baron Kusumoto and Messrs. Nakamura, Minoura, and Suzuki are endeavouring to reconcile the disputants, it expresses the opinion that this incident may result either in the abandonment of the scheme of administrative reform or in a final rupture between the Liberals and Progressists. The Mainichi Shimbun (Progressist) writes as though it considers the breach final and has no desire to build a bridge. Count Itagaki is strongly condemned on the ground that he thinks more of his own Department than of the interests of general reform, and that, whereas he used to be a conspicuous advocate of the principle of Cabinet Ministers' united responsibility, he is now a conspicuous violator of that very principle. The Mainichi Shimbun has never acted as a link to hold the Liberals and Progressists together. Perhaps it has always regarded their union as a mistake. Its present attack upon the Liberal leader can not help to soften the mood of his followers.

The threatened Cabinet crisis—if the term be not an exaggeration—is apparently a thing of the past. Count Itagaki, having withdrawn his objections to the various proposals which he had been disposed to condemn, presided at the meeting of the Administrative Reform Committee on the 3rd instant, and the discussion made such rapid progress that two or three further conferences are expected to suffice for drafting the complete programme of reform. The result is not likely to be announced, however, for three or four weeks, as the draft has to pass through the hands of the Legislative Bureau in the first instance; then to be considered by the Cabinet in full conclave; and then to go before the Emperor for approval.

Under the circumstances nothing is publicly known of the scheme now assuming final shape under the hands of the Committee. But rumour confidently alleges that all idea of abolishing the Metropolitan Police Bureau and the Departments of Justice and Education has been abandoned; that the organization changes will be limited to combining some bureaux and sections and abolishing others; that the number of officials will be diminished; that the salaries of the lower grades will be increased, and that the Regulations for Official Appointment will be amended in the sense of making members of the House of Representatives eligible for all the higher offices—Chokunin and Sōnin—without examination. It is also stated that similar eligibility will be declared in the case of members of city and prefectural assemblies and graduates of officially recognised schools, but that the appointment of such persons will be made to depend on the verdict of a Committee of Selection (Senko iin). We can only say that if such changes are introduced, they will be the only really retrogressive legislation during the Meiji era.

THE SILK MEN OF YOKOHAMA.

The dispute between the silk-men of Yokohama and the Specie Bank appears to be growing acuter. Briefly speaking, their accusation is that whereas the Bank has ten million yen of State funds on which it pays interest of only 8 per cent., it charges Japanese silk-men from 10 to 11½ per cent. for accommodation, and is very reluctant to assist them, though it lends readily and at low rates to foreign merchants. The persons preferring that accusation are Messrs. Hara Zenzaburo, Mogi Sobei, Ono Mitsukaga, Anzai Tokubei and so on; men whose reputation lends great weight to their words. The Specie Bank denies the accuracy of their allegations, but the details of its denial are not published. The silk-men have asked for aid from the Treasury. They point to the facts that tea-dealers get seventy thousand yen annually of public money, and that a large sum was handed by the Finance Department to the Industrial Bank for the purpose of relieving the distress of the cotton-spinning industry, yet nothing whatever is done for silk, Japan's greatest staple of export; not even the export duty is abolished. In 1887 the silk for export was only 47,400 bales (Japanese); in 1895, it had increased to 130,800 bales, but the pecuniary facilities for carrying on the business remained the same as ever.

It is difficult to suppose that the silk-men seriously expect the Treasury to furnish them with capital for carrying on their business, yet they can certainly point with much force to the subsidy granted to the tea trade by the Diet. The aid provided by Count Inouye for the distressed cotton industrials can be justified in a great measure. Large sums of capital already invested in that industry would have been lost had not some succouring measure been adopted. But no such consideration applies to the case of the middle-men engaged in the silk trade. We are astonished, therefore, to find that their petition is strongly endorsed by the Mainichi Shimbun. Apparently that journal attributes the diminution of silk production since 1896 partly to scarcity of capital; otherwise its mention of the fact in this context becomes inexplicable. But, indeed, the whole of the Mainichi's article is difficult to comprehend, for while asserting, on the one hand, that splendid prices are now ruling for silk in the Yokohama market, it alleges, on the other, that foreign buyers, seeing the dearth of capital among the Japanese, are holding on until the latter are driven to make sales at a sacrifice. It is comfortable to turn from such writing to the columns of the Keizai Zasshi, where the principle of State interference in such matters is roundly and uncompromisingly condemned, the subsidy to the tea dealers, the aid given to the cotton-spinners, and the purchase of the Industrial Bank's debentures by the Treasury being all grouped together as official blunders. We ourselves are disposed to think that the silk-men's campaign is against the Specie Bank only. They want to get accommodation from it on better terms, and they have organized this agitation with that aim. They must know very well that the Treasury has no funds to place at their disposal. It would be a very pleasant time if we could all fall back upon the State to supply money for the conduct of our businesses.

ANOTHER JUDICIAL TROUBLE.

The public have been hearing a great deal of late about the Judicial Department. The action of Mr. Sone, Minister of Justice in the last Ito Cabinet, who, just before going out of office, succeeded in effecting a wholesale removal of antiquated judges; the vehement protest which that action evoked from the former President of the Supreme Court, Mr. Kojima Iken, and the defence of Mr. Sone's procedure undertaken by the Tokyo Bar collectively and by Mr. Okamura Teruhiko individually—all these events attracted much attention. Another incident is now reported which seems likely to cause much excitement. The present Procurator-General, Mr. Yokota, was Vice-Minister of Justice in the Ito Cabinet. It is understood that he worked vigorously in conjunction with the Minister, Mr. Sone, to effect the above weeding out of the Judiciary, and Mr. Kojima Iken's attack was therefore principally directed against him, a plausible pretext for questioning his motives being furnished by the fact that he himself profited largely by the judicial changes, inasmuch as he obtained promotion from the Vice-Ministership of Justice to the post of Chief Public Procurator. The report now circulated—not by Opposition journals but by papers favourable to the Government—is that Mr. Ohigashi Gitetsu, Minister of Justice, influenced by ex-Chief-Justice Kojima's representations, privately advised Mr. Yokota to resign, and was met with a peremptory refusal. The Minister, not seeing his way to let the matter rest there, has decided to take an extreme step, namely, to reduce Mr. Yokota to the position of Chief Procurator of a provincial appeal court—in Sendai or Miyagi—and to deprive him altogether of his office, as a disciplinary measure, should he refuse to accept the lower post, as he probably will. The Yomiuri Shimbun, relating this incident, predicts that it will cause as much commotion as did the Takano affair, and adds that it fails altogether to perceive how Mr. Yokota can be held guilty of the offences laid to his charge by Mr. Kojima Iken, namely, violating the Constitution and breaking the law. At the same time, it thinks that Mr. Yokota has been injudicious. He should have foreseen that the action he took in conjunction with Mr. Sone would provoke criticism and opposition, and should have made arrangements to avert complications, above all by refusing himself to profit by the changes he worked to accomplish. Hence the Yomiuri, while condemning the Minister's procedure, at the same time recommends Mr. Yokota to resign. We may mention that Mr. Yokota is one of Japan's most competent jurists. It was he that drafted the the Revised Criminal Code soon to be brought before the Diet.

THE OZAKI INCIDENT.

Apparently it does not strike Mr. Ozaki Yukio's assailants that not his utterances but their own criticisms suggest want of loyal circumspection. That is certainly what foreign observers see most clearly. They can not reconcile this semi-hysterical outcry with the existence of any deep-rooted faith in the stability of imperial institutions. If men have absolute confidence in the strength of a house's foundations, they remain quite undisturbed though the wind beats against its walls. It is not wise to be over-solicitous, for solicitude suggests apprehension, and apprehension does not coexist with firm faith. Just now the English people are probably as much attached to the Throne as are the Japanese. It is true that they have outgrown all illusions about the "divine rights" of Sovereigns. They recognise the monarchy simply as an essential part of the polity that suits their natural temperament and their national circumstances, and they surround it with respect and even reverence became they understand that such an environment is essential to its stability. But they are not in the smallest degree perturbed by sporadic utterances of republican sentiment, for they know that no fear need be entertained of an epidemic. If a solitary speech delivered by an English publicist threw several leading London journals into a state of perturbation because it contained a passing reference to republican institutions, then indeed we should begin to think that royalty was in peril. And that is precisely what many foreigners will think when they observe the commotion caused by the speech of the Minister of State for Education. We do not say that they will be right in thinking it. The feeling entertained by Japanese subjects towards the Throne is a thing apart; a thing which few foreigners can fully comprehend and fewer still appreciate. We ourselves have no doubt that most of the clamour provoked by Mr. Ozaki's reference to a Japanese republic is inspired by a thoroughly genuine abhorrence of any suggestion, however remote or hypothetical, pointing to a change of the form of government in this country. But all students of Japanese affairs will not share our confidence, and we commend that fact to the consideration of the men who are trying to make political capital out of the incident.

"A LEAP INTO THE LIGHT."

That is the heading of an article in the Nippon which will probably amuse our Russian readers as much as it has diverted us:—Toseki was a memorable brigand. Mercy and righteousness are words that would have sounded strangely in his mouth. Yet, had he spoken them, it would scarcely have been right to stop one's ears because of his generally evil repute. Rather should advantage have been taken of his fitful moral impulse to urge him, to press him, to guide him, to invite him, to lead him to obey the prompting of his awakened conscience. A wicked man's affectation of virtue is at least one step in the right direction. If the ugliness of the pretence deterred every attempt to correct the wickedness, the world would improve but slowly. Hiranuma Senzo, the usurer, founded a school for the poor, and the applause that his act evoked led Okura Kihachiro to follow his example. If a man's deeds present any praiseworthy aspect, let us not probe the motives too deeply, nor withhold all approval because the source is tainted. Our rôle now should be to applaud Russia's new mood; to fall in with it; to treat it as genuine. It can be easily tested. She has only to give up Port Arthur. The rendition of Wei-hai-wei would follow, and then that of Kiao-chou. Such possibilities should not be lightly regarded.

NOTES ON NEWS.

Another monetary difficulty, this time on a large scale, is reported from Osaka. The directors of the Nishi-nari Railway Company are said to have discovered a deficiency of 257,000 yen in the assets of the Company. Mr. Manako, the President, explains that the money has been used for "promotion expenses," a conveniently vague formula which suggests that such enterprises in Japan are not without a secret history. The shareholders, however, find the explanation insufficient, and there is considerable commotion.

The first of the three steamers ordered from England by the Toyo Kisen Kaisha (Oriental Steamship Company), for service on the Hongkong-Yokohama-San Francisco line, is expected to reach Japan about the 20th of October. She is a vessel of 6,000 tons, 7,500 h.p., and maximum speed of 17 knots, and accommodation for 100 first-class passengers, 300 second-class, and 500 third-class. This vessel, which is called the Nippon Maru, will be quickly followed by the Hongkong Maru, and according to the present programme, the service will commence on December 15th.

The recent heavy rain has been followed by the almost invariable result, injury to the Tokaido Railway and suspension of traffic. This time the scene of the damage is between Kambara and Okitsu, and the immediate cause of the trouble was the overflow of the river Okitsu. It is said that three or four days will be required for effecting repairs.

Prices of commodities continue to decline. If the average of the principal staples—excluding rice and sake—in January, 1887, be put as 100, it appears that the corresponding figure for June of current year was 179; the figure for July, 168; and the figure for August, 166. Things have not yet descended, however, to the level of August, 1897, which was 160.

A telegram from Söul, published by the Yomiuri Shimbun, says that the detailed agreement relating to the Söul-Fusan Railway has at length been drafted and is now under consideration. It is expected that this much-mooted question will be finally disposed of in a few days. The concessionaires are Mr. Omiwa Chobei and another.

The Tohoku Railway has been injured by the recent heavy rain, and we regret to say that the injury has resulted in the overturning of a goods train, and the wounding of six persons, one severely. The principal damage to the road is between Kurosawa-jiri and Kanagasaki, some 60 miles north of Sendai, and the accident to the goods train happened at 7 p.m. on the 3rd instant. It is not expected that the line can be re-opened to traffic for a considerable time.

Referring to the "210th day," which fell this year on September 1st, it may be worth while to explain a point to which our attention has been directed. The importance of fine weather on the 210th day—i.e. the 210th day from the 1st of the 1st month, old reckoning—consists in the fact that the rice is just then passing from flower to ear. But of course that stage occurs at different times in different districts, and, moreover, in no one district does a single day suffice for the process. Experience, however, seems to have shown the Japanese farmer that fine weather on the 210th day is generally indicative of climatic conditions favourable to the rice crop at its most critical stage. That is a sufficiently rational theory, and for the rest it may be observed that, where his own particular business is concerned, the Japanese farmer knows pretty well what he is about.

The rice crop does not appear to have suffered appreciably by the rains of the past few days. Some loss has doubtless been caused by inundations, but the general verdict is that the yield will be exceptionally fine, judging, of course, by present indications. It is stated that if these favorable conditions continue, the Bank of Japan will soon reduce its rate of interest.

The affair of the Nishinari Railway does not appear to attract as much attention as might be expected, judging from the magnitude of the sum said to be missing, namely 270,000 yen. It seems that the line has been in financial difficulties for some time, and that the directors have been trying to sell it, first to the Government and afterwards to the Sanyo Company.

The Gaikoku Gogaku Zasshi has followed in the wake of the Far East, and gone to the land of the shades. There were many difficulties in the way of such an enterprise. The promoters desired to cater for students, but the price of the magazine, 25 cents per copy, was more than the majority of students can afford to pay. Then the plan of teaching a language month by month in a fragmentary way, involving the lapse of several years before the necessary information is fully furnished, presents obvious objections. The editing of the magazine, too, was not uniform, mistakes being sometimes left uncorrected. Under these circumstances sales were limited, and its issue only lasted 12 months. The publishers (the Hakubunkan) announce that they are about to issue a new magazine, to be called 中學世界, Chūgaku Sekai, which will, to a certain extent, take the place of the Gogaku Zasshi. The first number is to appear on September 10th and the magazine will be a fortnighty.

In a leading article published in the Japan Times on high class education, the following passage occurs:—"Want of sufficient accommodation (in the Imperial University) obliges the authorities to prescribe the number of admissions, the result being that only those who possess scholarship are admitted. This is a very serious affair, for though we do not pretend to be acquainted with the precise condition of the arrangements, it would appear to us that the graduates of the Higher Schools of only average scholarship are precluded for ever from gaining admission within the walls of the University. This would appear like cheating the Higher School graduates of their privilege." These comments are very misleading. There is no such grievance as our contemporary supposes. All graduates of the High Schools enter one of the Universities. In some cases a delay of 12 months occurs after they have acquired the right to enter by passing the High School examination, but the delay is confined to students of subjects not taught as yet in the Kyoto University. That Institution receives surplus Engineering and several other classes of students who have qualified to enter a University, but is not ready as yet for students of Law and Literature. Thus there is no "cheating of Higher School graduates of their privileges." It may be well to state that students who are delayed a year owing to want of room in the Tokyo University, take precedence of all other applicants the following year.

THE PERRY INCIDENT.

As to the propriety of silence on the part of the foreign local newspapers, in the matter of the Perry incident, we entirely disagree with our correspondent "G.D." It was right, in our opinion, that notice should be taken of the false story published by two vernacular journals. They were not "unimportant papers," as our correspondent seems to think. The Yomiuri Shimbun and the Nippon are two of the leading Tokyo journals. It is our habit to notice what they write, since they certainly represent a section of Japanese public opinion, and we should certainly have exposed ourselves to an imputation far more injurious than that suggested by "G.D." had we kept silence in this instance. With regard to what "G.D." calls our "de-haut-en-bas attitude towards the entertainment and indirectly to its guest, scarcely concealing a sneer," we have only to say that, from the outset, the extravagant aspect of the celebration presented itself to us in a very strong light, and induced us to refrain from publishing the account of the speeches, &c., as forwarded by the Welcome Society. We considered the entertainment ill-advised. Perceiving, however, and appreciating the liberal and graceful motive of the promoters, we refrained from hostile criticism. A long residence among the Japanese was not necessary to foresee that the eyes of a laughter-loving people would certainly be fixed on the humorous side of the incident. The want of proportion between the occasion and the demonstration could not fail to thrust itself upon intelligent observation, and it is not at all surprising, though it is distinctly humiliating, to find that a public entertainment organized under the auspices of an important body like the Welcome Society, has been greeted with a chorus of laughter and nicknamed the go-yen no peroro-kai, or the "five-yen gobble-gathering." One word more. "Surely," says, "G.D.", "the Mail and all of us might welcome any voluntary attention of the Japanese to a foreigner when it was kindly meant and pleasantly carried out." That observation embodies an entirely new view of the affair. If it was "a voluntary attention of the Japanese to a foreigner," then it becomes entirely laughable, for its object had not the most shadowy claim as an individual to any such attention. But the opening paragraph of our correspondent's letter shows that his final reference to the personal element was not seriously considered. He regards the affair, and so do we regard it, as a public demonstration intended to prove to foreigners that Japan is friendly to them and that the liberal regimen is irrevocably established. It was from that point of view that we considered it, and it is from that point of view that we deem it ill-advised and undignified.

THAT ADMIRABLE MEMORIAL.

Men have been known to be proud of a deformity because it was monstrous, or of a disease on account of its rarity. But a community, an educated, grown-up community, proud of such a memorial as the Kobe residents recently addressed to Lord Salisbury—that is a very remarkable instance of self-conceit. Nothing else was needed to crown the fiasco. Quainter, if possible, is Kobe's idea of the reward it has earned. The Kobe Consulate is to be as well paid henceforth as that of Yokohama, and the Kobe Chronicle rejoices with exceeding great joy over the fact, explaining it thus:—

> Can it be also, that the lead taken by Kobe in memorializing the British Government on the matter of the Treaties has also had its effect? While Yokohama remained quiescent and inactive, Kobe took the lead, and Yokohama followed in a weak sort of way, with an air of humility and thankfulness for the smallest of mercies that does not seem to have had much effect with the authorities. The China Association, I hear, has already commented upon the difference between the two ports, but it is perhaps somewhat unfair to blame the Yokohama people for not signing the memorial, for it is very certain that the great majority of British residents there would have attached their signatures to it if they had had an opportunity. Arrangements had indeed been made by the Kobe Committee to take a room at one of the hotels in Yokohama, where the memorial would have lain for signature, but after arrangements had been made it was found that time would not permit this to be done, and so the memorial had to be sent off with the Kobe and Nagasaki signatures only, Nagasaki having responded promptly to the suggestion made from Kobe.

The Yokohama Chamber of Commerce refused to endorse the Memorial because it contained gross misstatements—misstatements of such a nature as to make its signatories ridiculous. And now we are told that "it is somewhat unfair, perhaps, to blame the Yokohama people for not signing the Memorial" for "the great majority of the British residents there would have attached their signatures to it if they had had an opportunity!" There are in every community a certain number of men who, knowing nothing about a question and wishing not to be troubled with any knowledge, can easily be induced to conclude that the side on which some of their friends are marshalled must be the right side. Had the Memorial come into the hands of such persons in Yokohama, and had they seen that it bore the signatures of many of their Kobe friends, they would doubtless have added their names also, and the dimensions of the fiasco would have been proportionately increased. But fortunately it came, in the first instance, into the hands of men who, having some sense of responsibility, had devoted to careful inquiry the time spent by the framers of the Kobe Memorial in composing what must be regarded as one of the giddiest, most erroneous, and least impartial documents that ever obtained the endorsement of a mercantile community. The merchants of the senior port, however anxious they must have been to work hand in hand with Kobe, could not put their names to gross errors. Thus Yokohama is now happily beyond the range of the ridicule evoked by the Memorial, and, whereas Kobe's mistakes and intemperance have made it impossible for Lord Salisbury to use the Memorial with any effect, Yokohama has been working with intelligence and knowledge which have secured the full cöoperation of the Foreign Ministers and the appreciative consideration of the Japanese Government.

And a Kobe newspaper now seeks to persuade its readers that the status of their Consulate has been raised because they have given evidence of their capacity to follow ignorant and headstrong leaders! Well, yes: there is something in the idea. After all, the Kobe folks have much greater need of Consular guidance and restraint than the Yokohama community has.

OJI PAPER MILL.

There appears to be considerable trouble among the operatives of the Oji Paper Mill. Discontent has been manifested ever since the commencement of last month. An attempt was then made to effect a settlement by dismissing a manager and an overseer, but as 53 employés were sent away at the same time, the dissatisfaction continued to grow, until finally it spread to the two branch offices of the Mill in Shizuoka. There, also, a change of managers proved fruitless, and recently the whole of the hands went on strike, to the number of seven or eight hundred, demanding a considerable increase of pay, and talking of bloodshed and dynamite. It is said that the principal officers of the Company have tendered their resignations, and that an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders is to be held for the purpose of consulting on a course.

KOBE AND YOKOHAMA.

Our readers are probably aware that, for reasons which still await full explanation, Yokohama is no longer to be the premier port of Japan, so far, at any rate, as British official recognition in the matter of consulates is concerned. The Kobe and Yokohama consulates are to be placed on an equality, the salary of the former being somewhat increased and of the latter proportionately diminished. Had the old conditions remained unchanged, Mr. J. C. Hall would doubtless have taken Mr. Troup's place at Yokohama, and Mr. J. H. Longford, would have succeeded Mr. Hall at Kobe, but it is stated that these changes will not take place. Messrs. Hall and Longford will remain at their present posts, and Mr. H. A. C. Bonar will probably come to Yokohama. In short, Yokohama and Kobe are to stand on the same plane. The Kobe Chronicle not unnaturally exults over this feather in the cap of the younger port, and, with that accuracy of information which always distinguishes it, adds that Yokohama is no longer to be No. 1 in the British Consular Service, "nor even to stand as No. 2, but to rank henceforth as No. 3." Our contemporary then discusses, in a manner very satisfactory to itself, the titles of Kobe to this recognition, and arrives at the conclusion that "Kobe may fairly claim it as a right that the Consular-General should make that port his headquarters." We have never before heard of a "Consular-General," and if Kobe thinks that it is to have a brand new official with an unprecedented name all to itself, we fear that it will be disappointed. In connexion with this subject we may refer to another on dit circulated by the same well-informed journal, to the effect that, in view of the Consuls in Japan being deprived by and by of judicial authority, the British Government "has reduced salaries all round." We believe the statement to be unfounded.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

There is evidently a serious intention of pushing the project for an international exhibition in 1902 to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of Japan to the world. As originally referred to by the vernacular press, 1899 was the year mentioned; a mistake, evidently. An international exhibition would be a very good thing, and we do not see why Japan should not have one, but it may be doubted whether an interval of two years would be sufficient between the Paris Exhibition in 1900 and a similar enterprise in Tokyo in 1902. The distance of Europe from Japan will also prove a very serious drawback, and another obstacle is the want of accommodation. Mr. Takahashi Yoshio, Manager of one branch of the great Mitsui Firm, who appears to be the most active promoter of the scheme, is represented as saying that every one possessing house room would doubtless be pleased to accommodate visitors. That sounds like a hopelessly unpractical suggestion. Japanese people living in Japanese houses could not possibly accommodate foreign visitors, and foreign residents assuredly would not show hospitality to any persons except their own friends. However, it is conceivable that enterprising men might set themselves to solve the dilemma by running up temporary structures to serve as hotels. One consideration greatly in favour of the project is that, by 1902, the smooth working of the Revised Treaties—for we have no doubt of their smooth working—will have become an established fact, and it would be an excellent plan to invite as many foreigners as possible to bear witness to the success.

UNION OF COTTON IMPORTERS.

A telegram from Osaka says that a project is on foot, and has well nigh matured, for a union of Japanese and foreign merchants engaged in the import of raw cotton. The scheme is to embrace Osaka, and Kobe, and to be extended, if possible, to Yokohama. It is with the object of checking the arbitrary action of the associated cotton-exporters of Bombay that the idea of an union on this side has been started. The Bombay men have virtual control of this market owing to the advantage that their combination gives them vis à vis the competition in Japan. It is proposed to include American and Chinese dealers in the union, but that feature of the scheme is a little obscure.

We spoke in our last issue of a cotton dealers' union now in process of organization in Kobe and Osaka. According to the account originally published, the object of the union was to combat the control of the combined cotton exporters of Bombay. But later statements entirely modify that version. We now gather that the union is designed to make importers of raw cotton independent of the spinners on whose account it is imported. The promoters of the scheme are the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, the Naigai Wata Kaisha, and the Nihon Menka Kaisha. About 40 members have already been enrolled, and at a meeting held on the 2nd instant in the Osaka Hotel, a form of agreement and a schedule of rules were drafted. Foreign merchants are invited to join, whether in Osaka, Kobe, or Yokohama, and it is also contemplated to enlist the cöoperation of exporters of raw cotton in China and America. We gather from the rules that the union will be called the Nihon Menka Domei Kaisha, and that the head office will be in Osaka.

Such a movement does not improve the prospects of the already-embarrassed cotton-spinning companies. It means that they will have to pay more for their raw material, and as they cannot realize a profit even at present rates, an increase of the cost of production will be a serious matter for them. The members of the Union, however, being business men, will presumably be careful not to create an impossible position for the spinners, since the import of raw cotton depends on the latter's prosperity.

A FOREIGN LOAN.

In our recent résumé of Japanese finance, we showed that a sum of 160 million yen remained to be raised, under the post-bellum programme, in the form of Public Undertakings and Railway bonds. Count Inouye's financial statement, as submitted to the House of Representatives, contained the same figures. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun now says that the Cabinet is understood to have resolved upon applying to England for the money; that a loan will be placed upon the market at 4 per cent., and that telegraphic instructions have been sent to London for the purpose of obtaining preliminary information. It is not certain, however, whether the loan will be raised in a lump sum, or whether subscriptions will be sought at intervals as required by the progress of the works to which the money is to be applied. We should imagine that there can not be any doubt about the matter. The Treasury will be unwilling to receive money not immediately required and yet necessitating the payment of large sums in interest. It is very easy to arrange for the raising of the loan by installments at fixed intervals. The only step required is to announce that the calls on the bonds shall be made at such and such times and of such and such dimensions.

THE TOKYO ELECTION AFFAIR.

The resignation of Mr. Yamada, Vice-Minister of Justice, has been accepted. "At his own request" is the formula employed. Mr. Nakamura Yoroku, a well-known figure in the Diet and a leader of the Progressist Party, is appointed in his place. Thus the curtain falls on the Kyobashi-election drama. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun is strongly condemnatory. It totally disapproves of such a hole-and-corner method of settling the affair. If Mr. Yamada abused his official authority, he should have been dismissed from office. If he did not abuse it, he should not have been removed at all. We admire the Nichi Nichi's ability, but sometimes it seems to impair the value of its comments by hypercriticism. Mr. Yamada does not carry with him into retirement the reputation of having abused his official authority. His resignation is another of those many sacrifices on the altar of sentiment with which the history of Japan has made us familiar. There is too much of this kanjo, we venture to think. It interferes perpetually with practical issues.

PRESIDENT OF THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA.

Mr. Kondo, President of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, made some interesting remarks in a speech delivered by him on the occasion of the Hitachi Maru's trial trip in Tokyo Bay on the 30th ultimo. The Hitachi, a vessel of 6,170 tons displacement, was built at the Mitsu Bishi Docks in Nagasaki. Her keel was laid on April 16th 1896, and her building has consequently been tolerably expeditious. Some 300 persons were invited to be present at her maiden trip, and Mr. Kondo's speech was one of the features of a sumptuous entertainment. After explaining that the Hitachi was the first vessel of such dimensions constructed in Japan, and that she had qualified to rank as A 1 at Lloyds, he went on to say that when the former Mitsu Bishi and Kyodo Unyu Steamship Companies were amalgamated in 1885 to form the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the total displacement of their combined fleets was 61,000 tons, whereas the figure now stood at 189,000 tons, or more than the triple of the former. Further, the length of the lines served by the Company's vessels had been 5,900 nautical miles in 1885, and was now 46,900 miles. Again, the Company's biggest ship at that time was the Yamashiro Maru, a vessel of 2,500 tons, whereas the fleet now comprised 12 ships of the Hitachi class, all of over 6,000 tons. Each of these steamers was capable of carrying 2,000 soldiers with their equipment in time of war, and it was thus easy to see what an immense addition had been made to the offensive capabilities of the nation.

Mr. Kondo's speech was not all sunshine. A significant shadow showed itself. The Company, he said, had expended no less than 11 million yen on its European line, and the question now to be considered was whether it could successfully compete with organizations all of which were in receipt of a considerable measure of State aid. The problem pressed specially for solution at present, inasmuch as the Japanese Company would probably have to face direct competition from German ship-owners. The Hamburg-American line of steamers had been extended to Yokohama, and the Nippon Yusen Kaisha had thus a rival on the very route now taken by its vessels.

THE RUSSIAN PROPOSAL

We have seen how the extremists of one section of Japanese opinion treat the Czar's proposal for disarmament. The Nippon speaks for them, using very insulting language, but also very comical. The other end of the scale is represented in the columns of the Mainichi Shimbun, which calls the incident an unlooked for blessing from heaven; regards the Hispano-American war as the last that the world will see for many a year; anticipates the speedy federation of the nations, and opines that the great principles of Christianity have won the victory "prepared for them from the beginning." O sancta simplicitas! What a bland and childlike view to take of this despairing protest against the length of England's purse!

REVELATIONS.

An extraordinary series of paragraphs has been appearing for some time in the columns of the Yorozu Choho. The Yorozu is perhaps the most enterprising of Japanese journals, but public opinion does not credit it with motives by any means as admirable as its fertility of conception. Whether public opinion judges harshly or wisely in this matter we are not prepared to say, but we find it very difficult to reconcile our contemporary's latest departure with any theory of genuine solicitude for social reform. Briefly stated, the programme deliberately laid out for itself by the Yorozu and pesistently followed has been to conduct secret inquiries into the lives of all the most prominent Japanese of the time, to whatever class they belong, and to publish the results of the inquisition. Something like four hundred skeletons have thus been dragged from the shelter of their cupboards and exposed to the view of the world. At present the Yorozu confines itself to the erotic phases of life. It proclaims the names of men that keep mistresses and of men otherwise unfaithful to their marriage vows. There are only a few foreign residents on the catalogue, but we presume that their turn will come in due course. For the moment, however, the affairs of Japanese celebrities have naturally more interest in the eyes of Japanese readers than the affairs of strangers, and the Yorozu deals almost exclusively with the former. It professes to be actuated solely by a desire to effect reform, and there can be no doubt that the shock of publicity will prove a severe punishment to many of the persons named. But as for the ingenuousness of the Yorozu Choho, there are excellent reasons to be sceptical. Wherever it is possible to manufacture a romance out of materials collected by the searcher after skeletons, a spicy and sensational tale is constructed, and the paragraphist never hesitates to draw upon his own imagination for details which, though a novelist would certainly be justified in supplying them, are obviously pure conjectures. It is our frank opinion that such journalism is much more likely to impair than to improve public morality.

A DIFFICULT CASE.

In the highest court of justice there are few stripes, we are told, for those that violate the law unwittingly. What should be done with the Chinese woman, a resident of Hawaii, whose story is this:—"The husband of the woman died several years ago. The widow and two children became of the household of a relative. The relative became poor. Business was bad with him. The woman felt that she and the children were too much of a burden for the kind friend who so willingly shared his all with them. The children were old enough to be told and they practically understood. They agreed that it was best to die and go to their father's presence and cease as a burden here. One of the children went on the errand to buy opium. The drug was made a drink in a saucer, and partaken of by all. The children died, the woman recovered. She does not comprehend that she has been criminal. Her people do not expect her to understand it."

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM.

It really seems as though that castle in the air, "administrative reform," was likely to be at last removed from the field of political vision. Year after year, since 1888, the formula gyasei seiri has been upon the lips of politicians. They were always careful to avoid any clear definition of what they meant by the expression, but they used it with such persistence and gave to it such a prominent place in their list of "urgent duties" that the nation learned to regard it as something of very large dimensions. We have seen how, when the present Cabinet came into power, a committee was at once appointed, under the presidency of Count Itagaki, to make investigations preliminary to administrative reform; we have seen how the heads of the Constitutional Party drafted a list of the "reforms" that they considered essential; we have seen how certain journals, led by the Fiji Shimpo, urged the necessity of making a clean sweep of the official mansion, and filling it with new occupants and a new atmosphere, and we heard the frequent gibes and sneers directed recently against the ministry by Opposition journals and even by its own organs because the much talked-of "reforms" hung fire. It is not a little surprising, therefore—or rather it would be surprising had we not all along understood how unpractical the outcry was—to find the Liberal organ (Tokyo Shimbun) now coming out with a "flat-flooted" statement that the administrative machine, as it exists at present, was framed by the "clan statesmen" on the best Occidental models, and that radical changes would be improper. Anything like a great and general alteration, or a complete renewal of personnel, is out of the question. To get rid of abuses due to favouritism; to amend the regulation for official appointments, and to reduce formalities and red tape to a minimum—these, says the Tokyo Shimbun, are the limits of rational reform. It is quite extravagant to talk of total reconstruction or "a second revolution," as some folks are fond of doing.

Other journals supplement the above very significant utterances by paragraphs saying that all idea of abolishing the Educational Department, or the Metropolitan Police Bureau, or the Department of Justice has been abandoned. Every reasonable person will endorse that view of the question. We have again and again expressed our own strong opinion as to the giddiness and irresponsibility shown by the clamorous advocates of "administrative reform" in past years, and we count it a matter for hearty congratulation that the reformers themselves have now discovered the unpractical character of their own demands. If this question were finally removed beyond the range of political discussion, there would be a greatly improved prospect of administrative and legislative efficiency.

DEAD-LOCK IN THE IMPORT TRADE.

Using big type, double-leaded and conspicuously placed, the Mainichi Shimbun informs the public that there is a project on foot to obtain Government assistance for solving the present dilemma in the import trade. Millions of dollars worth of goods are lying stored in Yokohama and Kobe, but the Japanese merchants to whose order they were imported can not take delivery, and very serious inconvenience is felt on all sides. Now the Government has been devoting large sums to the redemption of War Bonds and Consols, in order to relieve the pressure in the money market. If officialdom has a duty to perform in that respect, why should it not also recognise some obligation in the field of the country's foreign commerce? That is the question propounded to themselves by embarrassed Japanese merchants, and there is no difficulty in conjecturing the answer they find. Their idea, then, is that the Treasury should place a sum of 8 or 10 million yen at the disposal of the Specie Bank, and that the latter should give accommodation to Japanese middlemen, the foreign importers, on their side, remitting a moiety of the interest and storage charges on the goods. It is supposed that fully fifty per cent. of these goods could be sold to the consuming classes without difficulty or delay, and the proceeds of the sales could then be applied to releasing a further instalment of the accumulated imports. There is nothing to indicate the authority upon which our contemporary relies for the above statement.

AN IMPATIENT PUBLIC.

If the views and predictions of Tokyo journalists contained any measure of truth proportionate to the confidence and persistence with which they are advanced, the Liberals and Progressists ought to have fallen asunder long ago, for truly as many reasons have been discovered for their separation as the days their union has numbered. The Yorozu Choho now enumerates no less than six causes, each of which is in itself sufficient to produce a final split between the parties, and the whole six combined ought to dissolve them into their elements without a moment's delay. But this cry of "wolf" has become wearisome. No one imagines that the union of the two parties will be permanent. They joined hands for a destructive purpose and they will surely turn their backs on each other one of these days. For the moment, however, they are held together by a sentiment much more potent than any of the differences dragging them apart, the fear of ridicule. To part company after a two months' association would be to invite the laughter of the nation, chiefly at the expense of the seceding section. On which side is the onus of dissension to rest? That is the question difficult to decide.

Meanwhile, some journals—among them the Fiji Shimpo—are almost plaintive in their expressions of disappointment because the conflict is deferred. "Why don't you fly at each other's throats?" these papers say in effect. "What is the use of keeping up a timid pretence of concord? We all know that at heart you are mutually hostile. One half of you advocate the State purchase of private railways; the other half oppose it. Yet you leave the question to be discussed by outsiders, and carefully refrain from ventilating it yourselves. You are like shy girls fearful of opening your lips. Fight it out at once and discover where you are and how you stand. The public are getting tired of watching for the fracas."

MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND CHIEF PUBLIC PROCURATOR.

We apprehend that the Chief Public Procurator is on the verge of defeat at the hands of the Minister of Justice. Frankly speaking, we can not tell what Mr. Kokota's offence has been. Here are three questions which are said to have been propounded to him by the Minister, together with the answers given by him:—

Q. What was the reason for amending the regulation fixing the establishment of Judges and Public Procurators; and did you intend to have recourse to the intervention of a bench of judicial officials in the event of resistance being offered to the changes recently made among Judges and Public Procurators?

A. The reasons are set forth in the Petition to the Throne on the subject. As for the intentions I may have entertained, I see no occasion either to state them or to answer for them.

Q. Before making the changes in the Judiciary, did you assemble the Judges of the Supreme Court and consult with them?

A. I did speak with two or three of the Judges. But I uttered no word that could be construed as enlisting their consent or asking for their support. I merely asked that if they considered the proposed changes proper, they would assume an impartial attitude towards them.

Q. Did you send letters to Judges Mizukami and Watanabe, telling them to come privately to Tokyo, as they might possibly be appointed Judges of the Supreme Court?

A. I did write to them, and I did tell them to come privately, because it seemed inexpedient to to create an unnecessary fuss about the matter. As for the prospect of their being appointed to the Supreme Court, my remark was based on the fact that vacancies had already been created by resignations.

As impartial readers of this catechism, we are bound to say that if the charges implied in the questions are serious, Mr. Yokota's answers are not absolutely limpid. At all events the vernacular press says that the matter has now come before the Cabinet, and that Mr. Yokota will be removed to a Provincial Court, on the ground that his continued presence at the Supreme Court would interfere with the smooth working of the further judicial changes contemplated by the Minister of State for Justice. That is quite intelligible. If the superannuated or inefficient members of the Judiciary are to be induced to cöoperate in the proposed reform by voluntarily effacing themselves, the sacrifice will not be rendered easier for them by Mr. Yokota's presence as Chief Procurator of the Supreme Court, and he, on his side, should not be altogether unwilling to facilitate matters by passing out of the foreground for the moment.

SÖUL-FUSAN RAILWAY.

Now that the concession for the Söul-Fusan Railway has been obtained, or is on the point of being obtained, we can not help wondering whether it will prove a white elephant. The distance is 250 miles, and the cost of construction is estimated at 20 million yen, or 80,000 yen a mile. It must be conferred that the figure is high, but even if we put it at sixty thousand yen a mile, the sum required is 15 million yen. Where can such an amount be obtained at present? The Nippon talks of completing the work in four years, and writes in a peremptory strain about the necessity of commencing at once, but when we remember that money can not be found in Japan at present even for completing domestic lines already commenced, one must be very sanguine to expect that fifteen millions will be subscribed for a line in a foreign country.

THE WEATHER.

The confused weather of the past week is clearly reflected in the reports of the Meteorological authorities. On the 2nd instant a slight barometrical depression made itself apparent in the South of Kiushiu, from whence it travelled to the southern coast of Shikoku, and entering the main island from the east, passed northward by the east coast, reaching Hokkaido on the afternoon of the 4th. This, however, was a comparatively insignificant disturbance. It had scarcely disappeared when another depression, coming, apparently, from some distant point in the southern seas, was reported from Kishiu and the adjacent islands, and was followed by a rapid fall of the barometer over the whole country, with the exception of the south, where, strange to say, the meteorological conditions showed an improvement. Early on the morning of the 6th, however, the reports from the south indicated that the area of depression had extended thither also, simultaneously with a farther marked sinking of the barometer in every part of the empire. Heavy rain now began to fall in various places, and at 7.30 a.m. on that day (6th), the meteorological authorities warned the greater part of the coast districts. By the afternoon, the depression had become very low from Kishiu throughout the central provinces, and the warning was extended to the inland districts as well the coasts, and at 11 p.m. on that night, the warning was repeated.

So much injury has been suffered by the lines of telegraph that the Meteorological Observatory is not able to publish any detailed account of the course of the gale, or the readings of the barometer. It is supposed, however, that the centre of the storm entered the main island in the vicinity of Hamamatsu, and that its direction was north by east, the rate of progress being 40 miles an hour. Passing through Suruga, Kai, Kozuke and Shimotsuke, it reached Fukushima at 6 a.m, on the 7th instant, and sweeping thence across Rikuzen and Rikuchiu, crossed the sea, and striking Yezo on the southeast, finally emerged at Nemuro into the Sea of Okotsk. This course is to some extent conjectural, but, on the whole, may be regarded as tolerably accurate. It will be observed that Tokyo and Yokohama were on the edge of the storm, which accounts for the comparative immunity they enjoyed.

The lines of telegraph seem to have suffered most. One may almost say that the service is interrupted throughout the whole country. On the Tokaido route, one or two wires are available as far as Mishima, but beyond that there is no communication. The case is equally bad along the Nakasendo, the Naoyetsu-Uyeda-Takasaki line alone remaining. On the Tohoku route, the lines to Sendai and Wakamatsu are serviceable, but northward of Shirakawa communication is entirely interrupted.

Numerous injuries to railways also are reported. As usual the Tokaido line has a particularly bad record. On no less than three sections the traffic is interrupted; namely, the Oyama-Yamakita section, the Oyama-Gotemba and the Okitsu-Kambara. The most serious damage seems to be on the Yamakita-Oyama section, where a heavy landship has occurred, displacing the rails through a distance of 60 yards. It is expected, however, that two or three days will suffice to repair the injury. On the Japan Railway traffic is interrupted at two places, one between Nichimaru and Kuroiso and the other between Okamoto and Kataoka. The Ryomo road (Tokyo to Maebashi) has also suffered in two places, on the Ashikaga-Tomita and the Omata-Omama sections. The iron bridge over the Tonegawa beyond Kurihashi, on the Tokyo-Utsunomiya road, was reported to be in danger, the river having risen 19 feet and threatening to rise still more, so that no tickets for any place farther north than Kurihashi were issued from the 7th instant. The worst damage of all seems to have been suffered on the line over the celebrated Usui Pass, where the Abt system is in use. Two or three tunnels between Yokokawa and Kumanotaira have given way, and experts report that there is no hope of restoring traffic for a considerable time.

In Tokyo the defects of over-head wire for telephones has been signally illustrated. Out of 3,800 subscribers to the service, no less than 1,465 found their telephones useless on the morning of the 7th instant.

With the regard to the effect upon the rice crop, it is not yet possible to speak with certainty, but the general impression is that no very serious injury has been done—certainly nothing comparable to the havoc wrought on the 9th of September last year. The force of the wind is said to have been less than that experienced in 1897 and the condition of the rice plants was much more favorable. The early rice (wase), of which the ears have already formed, was bent but not broken, and will consequently recover. The middle crop (nakute) is past the flowering stage but not yet heavy enough in the head to be much hurt. The late plants of the middle crop and the early plants of the third (ekute), being just at the flowering stage, were most seriously imperilled, but it is said that they have escaped without fatal damage. As for the late plants of the third crop, they were not in a condition to suffer much. Our readers must note, however, that these statements are only conjectural. Until the telegraph service is restored, it is impossible to speak with any certainty. There can be little doubt, however, that the millet fields within the area of the storm's track are terribly injured, for the stalks must have been broken and there is, consequently, no chance of the grain's ripening. The cotton crop also must be seriously damaged. We note that the market price of rice has advanced a little, but not sufficiently to suggest that much uneasiness has been inspired by the storm.

The storm of Tuesday night caused some damage in Yokohama harbour. The sailing ship Lyndhurst dragged her anchor, and drifted till she fouled the Marco Polo, which had come inside the breakwater in anticipation of the gale. The Marco Polo was struck by the Lyndhurst's bows, and both vessels sustained slight damage, the sailing ship having some plates forward dented, while some of the outer fixings of the warship were damaged. They got clear about 5 a.m. The Blue-funnel steamer Ixion parted her moorings, and the sailing ships Stronsa, and Samuel Scholfield dragged their anchors, but no serious results followed. The yacht Stella was carried by the force of the wind from her moorings to the Pier, against which she would probably have beaten herself to pieces but for the efforts of a party under Messrs. McGowan and F. Bailey, of Mr. Laffin's establishment, who by dint of hard work got her clear, and anchored her safely near the Water Police Station. She battered herself considerably, but the damage is merely superficial. The double-ended yacht Tomioka was lost.

A CHEQUE WITHOUT ASSETS.

It is stated that a certain Mr. Nakagawa Ichitaro, a dealer in imported indigo, whose place of business is Yokohama, has been attempting to effect purchases by means of a cheque on a bank where he has no assets. The amount involved is not large—only 1,003 yen—and the defaulter, when the cheque was returned after various transfers, appears to have pleaded error, offered 500 yen as part payment, and asked for a brief delay. Not being considered worthy of trust, however, he was arrested. The cheque was passed in the first instance to Messrs. Klingen and Seux, by whom the parcel of indigo had been imported.

LIBERALS AND PROGRESSISTS IN CHIBA.

There is a pronounced rupture between the Liberals and Progressists in Chiba Prefecture. The proximate cause of their difference is Mr. Abe, the Governor. He holds office there for the second time, and during his former tenure he made himself very unpopular among the Progressists, whereas the Liberals have always supported him. This divergence of views recently found strong expression in connexion with the election of four politicians to represent the Constitutional Party in the prefecture. We need not enter into details. The dispute has been referred to Tokyo.

THE PHILIPPINES.

It is stated that out of the five commissioners who are to proceed to Paris from the United States for the purposes of the conference with Spain, three are in favour of the permanent retention of the Philippines by America; the fourth will be guided by the President, who, in turn, will follow the trend of public opinion, and the fifth, being from a sugar-raising State, may not be disposed to welcome an accession of sugar-producing territory. Of course there will be unanimity on the part of the whole five before they leave America, but their individual views are now a subject of considerable interest.

MR. BOKU YEIKO.

It seems that Mr. Boku Yeiko is really about to return to Korea. Our readers doubtless remember that a rumour in that sense was circulated some time ago, and that the Korean refugee did actually proceed to Nagasaki, but it turned out that his object was only to meet his daughter, whose romantic story we related at the time. Now, however, there appears to be little doubt that the horizon has cleared sufficiently to permit of his return to Söul. The circumstances under which he goes are kept profoundly secret, but rumour says that he will probably be appointed to some high office when he reaches Söul. If that be true, we may assume that the party of progress is in the ascendant there, but our own information does not indicate that such is the case.

SUICIDE OF MR. W. G. WARD.

DEATH OF ANOTHER FAR EASTERN JOURNALIST.

The Kobe Chronicle says that on the 28th July an inquest was held at the City Mortuary concerning the death of Mr. George William Ward, whose body was found lying on the previous Monday afternoon in one of the tunnels at Moorgate Street Station. The deceased was a war correspondent, having represented the Daily Mail in Abyssinia, the Pall Mall Gazette during the Ashanti campaign, the Morning Post in the Soudan, and the Pall Mall Gazette in the China and Japan war. A bill-poster named William Huck stated that he saw the body lying twenty yards inside the tunnel. The head was lying between the lines. His clothes were not disarranged, and his hat and umbrella were placed carefully at his side, together with a bottle labelled "Poison." The divisional surgeon of the police (Dr. Frederick Gordon Brown) deposed that the bottle contained morphia. A hyperdermic syringe was found in the pocket of the deceased, and probably he injected some morphia to deaden his feelings. The deceased's father, Mr. Robert Ward, of Swindon, stated that his son suffered acutely from rheumatism, caught through falling into the Nile, and that it must have been the intense pain which drove him to end his life. The jury returned a verdict of "Suicide whilst temporarily insane."

Mr. W. G. Ward, says the Chronicle, is well known in the East. He was originally connected with a paper in Egypt, and afterwards made his way to Hongkong, where he joined the staff of the Hongkong Telegraph in Mr. Fraser Smith's days. While connected with this journal he was brought up before the Hongkong Court on a charge of conspiring with Mr. Fraser Smith to injure the character of a Mr. Minhinnett by publishing certain charges in the paper concerning him, and after a lengthy trial each of the accused was sentenced to a term of imprisonment. The sentence excited much criticism throughout the Far East, as all that Mr. Ward appears to have done was to draw the attention of the police to evidence coming to his knowledge which appeared very convincing. Mr. Fraser Smith was released after a short time, but Mr. Ward served his sentence, and was never the same man again, so deeply did the iron enter his soul. Some time afterwards he went to Siam, where he started the Siam Free Press, but, the climate disagreeing with him, he returned to Hongkong, where he was in the hospital for some months and thus lost an engagement to serve the New York Herald in the China Japan war. On his recovery he went to the front for the Pall Mall Gazette, and wrote some remarkable sketches for that journal of the struggle at Wei-hai-wei. Proceeding home at the conclusion of the war, he was engaged to go to Egypt for the Pall Mall, and later represented the Morning Post and the Daily Mail. His sad end will be much regretted by the friends he made wherever he went. Curiously, it occurred exactly a fortnight after the suicide of another Far Eastern journalist, Mr. H. Tennant, and the two men were much alike in disposition, both having periods of high spirits which alternated with spells of deep despondency.

KILLED BY AN ELECTRIC WIRE.

About 6 30 on Wednesday evening a telephone wire in Motomachi, Honjo, Tokyo, was severed by the force of the typhoon, and fell down into the street. In its fall it struck a man named Yuyama Komekichi, and he fell to the ground. The telephone wire somehow made a connection with an electric light wire; and thus a current of great strength was induced. Yuyama was killed and three other persons coming within the circuit were injured, while a police inspector who came to their assistance received a severe shock.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS IN JAPAN.

ONE of the questions of the time is the manner of appointing officials in Japan. When Marquis ITO reorganized the administration in 1885, he obtained the Emperor's approval of a set of regulations (kwanri ninyō-rei), the gist of which was that all official appointments, below those of the chokunin class, should thenceforth depend upon proof of efficiency furnished by examination. These regulations were welcomed as a signal reform, being regarded as an effective instrument for putting an end to the abuse of favouritism. The outcry against "clan government" had not then attained the dimensions to which it was subsequently raised by party politicians. Favouritism, however, is an abuse inseparable from every bureaucratic system, and there was certainly reason to complain of favouritism at the time of the Administration's reorganization in 1885. Marquis ITO'S reform doubtless had its origin in a sincere desire to place the system of Government on a better footing, irrespective of any desire to protect the clan statesmen against the charges, of which they were ultimately destined to be the object—though in truth they were charges which a clear-eyed statesman like the Marquis might have been expected to foresee. Still, there is no doubt that the effect of the regulations should have been to deprive the "clan statesmen's" assailants of their main weapon of attack, for from the moment when applicants for office were required to furnish qualifying tests by passing examinations of a fixed standard, it ceased to be possible to say that the ranks of officialdom were recruited from the personal friends, relatives, and connexions of cabinet Ministers, rather than from men of genuine merit. That feature of the regulations was accentuated by a provision that graduates of the Imperial University would be eligible for appointment without examination. In other words, graduates of the Imperial University became possessed of the first claims to office, and, until their claim was satisfied, there could be no recouse to even the very ineffectual favouritism that a Minister might exercise by influencing the verdict of the public examiners on behalf of his own protegés. The reform seemed thoroughgoing and enlightened, and not only did the public welcome it, but they also estimated it at the value which it certainly possessed. With such regulations in full force it was always for us very difficult to appreciate the justice of the clamour raised in later years against what the political agitators were pleased to call the jōjitsu naikaku, or cabinet of favouritism. The epithet plainly could not apply to the general body of officialdom. If had to be taken as referring to occupants of the highest offices—portfolio-holders, members of the Privy Council, and other chokunin officials—or to men who obtained promotion through the influence of a patron without examination. In short, the only interpretation that thoughtful persons could put upon the crusade against "clan statesmen" was that, in the first place, a system which limited the personnel of the Ministry to a small coterie of men without any popularly endorsed titles, seemed to the agitators to be inconsistent with the spirit of constitutional institutions; and, in the second, that the heads of the political parties, when they spoke of favouritism, thought only of the high offices to which they themselves aspired. Under such circumstances, when the "clan statesmen" recently effaced themselves, and party politicians stepped into their place, we, in common doubtless with many other foreign observers, watched curiously to see how the leaders of the onset upon "clan government" would justify their attack in the eyes of the nation—what steps they would take to correct the abuse of "favouritism" against which they had protested so vehemently. Indications of their mood had already been furnished. When the last MATSUKATA Cabinet assumed office with the support of the Progressist Party, voices very soon began to be raised in favour of what was called jinsai tōyō, or the employment of talent. To state the matter briefly, it was found that the regulations requiring applicants for office to qualify by examination constituted a very irksome obstacle to the aspirations of men who, by the exercise of undoubtedly high qualities, whether as political organizers, as party tacticians, as journalists, or as orators, had proved themselves worthy of public consideration, but who, being, for the most part, tolerably advanced in years and, at any rate, having long been strangers to the studies necessary for the successful passing of a public examination, could not hope to gain access to the ranks of officialdom by the regularly prescribed routes. Chokunin offices were, of course, open to these men—that is to say, offices commissioned direct by the SOVEREIGN—, but Sonin and Hannin offices were closed to them; and to explain what that meant the easiest method is to say that, whereas the annual salaries of Chokunin officials aggregate only 1⅓ million yen, in round numbers, those of Sonin and Hannin officials aggregate 21 million yen. Hence the talk of jinsai tōyō; the first vague expression of an idea that some method should be devised for utilizing the administrative talent which the party politicians believed that they possessed, but which the examination system precluded them from exercising as officials. The suggestion did not assume any definite shape at that time. Only one step was taken to satisfy the not unnatural ambition of the party politicians—a new office, that of Chokunin Councillors of Departments—was created, and prominent Progressists were nominated to the posts. But when party cabinets became an accomplished fact two months ago, and when what was called ryōkan netsu, or the office-hunting fever, assumed almost epidemic proportions among the rank and file of the Constitutionalists—to say nothing of the leaders—, proposals for a radical alteration of the "official appointments regulations" began to be heard again, and have been growing ever since in vehemence and insistence. We have alluded to this question more than once, and have incidentally described the singular attitude of the Jiji Shimpo, which advocates a complete clearance of the official mansion, on the ground that fresh atmosphere must be admitted, and that old clerks can not work satisfactorily with new masters. We are much mistaken if the Jiji's reputation does not suffer severely from the line it has pursued in this matter. A new master, if he be a man of any prudence or common sense, desires nothing better than to retain the services of an old clerk, who is familiar with the business and whose capacity has been developed and proved by experience. Moreover, the State is not without obligation towards the present occupants of office. They obtained their positions by satisfying certain tests for which they had to prepare themselves by a special course of education. They have served faithfully and efficiently, and to deprive them suddenly of their appointments merely because another step has been taken towards the consummation of representative institutions, and because the Meiji statesmen, who laid the foundation of those institutions, have been replaced by party politicians, would be one of the most indefensible procedures recorded in history. To these special considerations must be added the fundamental fact that, if the Jiji's plan were adopted in one case, it would be equally applicable to all, so that every change of Cabinet might involve an official revolution, and government in Japan would be disfigured by the very worst and most crippling abuse that can grew out of representative institutions. Happily there appears to be no prospect whatever that the Jiji's advice will be adopted, but to find such advice strenuously advanced by the country's leading journal, is very disquieting. Many rumours are afloat as to the course which seems most likely to find favour with the Cabinet in this matter. Nothing definite is yet known, but it is confidently alleged that the regulations for official appointments will be modified in the sense of extending the limits of eligibility without examination. If such a step be taken, it will be a national misfortune, in our opinion. Whatever specious plea may be advanced in its defence, the undisputable fact will remain that it is a large development of the "spoils system." History will say of Japan's party politicians that their advent to power, instead of correcting the evils of favouritism and corruption, against which they so vehemently inveighed before coming into office, created a mercenary political class, "an oligarchy of stipendiaries" and inaugurated a system which has elsewhere been shown to render politics repellant to all disinterested and genuinely patriotic men, and to make elections dependent upon issues which have nothing to do with the interests of the country, but are connected solely with the necessities and profits of a band of office-hunters. We commend to the attention of Japanese publicists the dictum of a well-known English authority that "the details of the Civil Service belong to a business, not a political, administration," and that "the line between proper political and non-political places is perfectly well defined." Men can not be pitchforked into office merely because they have shown themselves clever orators, adroit politicians, or successful agitators. Every step in the direction of abolishing the examination system, is an extension of the abuses of patronage and favouritism.

THE CHARGE OF ASSAULT AGAINST A BRITISH SUBJECT.

A CASE tried last Tuesday in H.B.M.'s Consulate illustrates a point to which we have more than once alluded in these columns, namely, the unfavorable position in which a foreigner may at any moment find himself placed if he happens to be involved in a difficulty with Japanese workmen or coolies, no foreign witnesses being present. The complainant in this instance was a Japanese coolie in the employ of the Pier Transport and Lighter Company; the defendant Mr. M. FITZGERALD, who manages the shipping agency of Mr. E. STANILAND. It appears that on July 14th, Mr. FITZGERALD employed the complainant and other coolies to carry a quantity of baggage to the Custom House. He declined, however, to pay the coolies at once, having, as he subsequently explained, some apprehension whether they might not appropriate the money instead of accounting for it to the Pier Company. He therefore told the head coolie to bring the bill to his office "at the proper time." The man complied, but was sent back without payment on the ground that the end of the month was "the proper time." What happened at the end of the month did not transpire, but it is certain that up to August 17th the money had not been paid. That, of course, is inexcusable. Remuneration for such services can not, with any shadow of propriety, be withheld from July 14th to August 17th. On the latter day, Mr. FITZGERALD, having occasion to go to the Hatoba, was accosted by the complainant and two other coolies, and what then ensued became the subject of the case in the Consular Court. The three coolies swore that they had simply asked for the money due to them; that Mr. FITZGERALD had at once pushed the head coolie aside and struck him heavily on the lip, and that at no time had they laid hands on Mr. FITZGERALD or otherwise assaulted him. Mr. FITZGERALD, on his side, swore that the coolies had preferred their demand at a place where a crowd of their fellows were at hand; then, on his telling them to apply to the office, the three had at once seized him, one gripping him by the throat, the other two taking hold of his arms; and that, seeing himself, as he supposed, in imminent danger, he had struck out in self-defence. He could not, however, cite any witness in support of his version, and the Court was on the point of condemning him when it occurred to him to say that he had lodged a complaint with the Japanese police at the time and had showed them the marks on his throat and his torn, crumpled collar. Mr. FORSTER, who occupied the bench, wisely suggested an adjournment for the purpose of hearing the testimony of the police, and when the trial was resumed, the main incidents assumed a very different aspect. For not only did a Japanese constable depose that FITZGERALD had come to the Water Police Station on August 17th, laid against the complainant a charge of assault, handed in a stick 2½ feet long as a weapon which had been used against him, and shown his torn collar, but two French citizens also came forward of their own accord, swore that they had seen the whole affair, that the coolies had mobbed FITZGERALD and laid hands on him before he struck out; that he had showed considerable patience, and that a heavy stick had been thrown at him. Of course the coolie's charge was at once dismissed, Mr. FORSTER thanking the Frenchmen who had volunteered such timely testimony and remarking that their intervention alone had prevented "a gross miscarriage of justice."

It is evident that had not M.M. SEUX and PRAVIEUX chanced to read a news paper report of the first day's proceedings, and had not their sense of justice induced them to take a step involving some personal inconvenience, not only would FITZGERALD have suffered a great wrong, but the coolies also would have been encouraged in a course which can not fail to lead to serious troubles and is probably responsible for the majority of the fracas that have hitherto occurred between foreigners and Japanese of the lower orders. We think it may fairly be said, of Yokohama at any rate, that the truculent, offensive coolie is the exception, the normal representative of the jinrikisha-man, the porter, and even the boatman being a civil, obliging, good-humoured fellow.

One of the former genus, however, works mischief which fifty of the latter can not efface, and the result is, not merely that the Japanese get an undeservedly bad name, but also that the pleasant relations which might otherwise exist between them and foreigners are unhappily impaired. The evil type of Japanese coolie thinks nothing of laying his hand upon a foreigner. He does not often impart to the process such vim as Mr. FITZGERALD'S duns employed, but he evidently thinks that where foreigners are in question, he is at liberty to resort to methods which, though the law of Japan does not class them with assaults, are, as he well knows, counted grossly rude by his own countrymen. That is a point which does not, perhaps, admit of immediate correction, as it demands some change of the law. But the other question, the legal helplessness of a foreigner when several Japanese combine to bear false witness against him, is vividly illustrated by this hatoba case. It is perfectly plain that the three Japanese coolies who gave evidence against FITZGERALD committed deliberate perjury. What is to be done with them? Will the Public Procurator cite them before a Japanese tribunal for perjury? It is his obvious duty to do so, and, if he shows any sign of neglecting it, we venture to hope that pressure will be brought to bear on him by his superiors. Indeed, the case seems well worthy of the attention of the Foreign Office in Tokyo, for it shows that any foreigner having a dispute with a coolie is liable to be mobbed if other foreigners are not present, and that, in the event of a natural effort of self-defence on his part, he is further liable to judicial punishment on the false statements of three or four unscrupulous men speaking in collusion. Contingencies of that kind are totally incompatible with the existence of friendly relations between foreigners and Japanese, and as a unique opportunity now presents itself for furnishing a useful object lesson to coolies of the evil class, we trust that it will be utilized.

PAST AND PRESENT.

CERTAIN landmarks stand out very clearly in any retrospect of the Meiji era. At its opening, the great bulk of the nation was enthusiastically pro-foreign. Occidental institutions were regarded with a sentiment of mixed admiration and respect. Whatever came from Europe or America must be worthy of imitation, and was imitated. It seemed as though the nation would lose all its individuality and become merely a feeble reflection of some Western people. The foreign resident in Japan at that epoch found his lot very pleasant. He was counted a kind of demi-god, infallible, omniscient. It never seemed to occur to the Japanese that degrees of competence might not be more marked among themselves than among the representatives of the wonderful new civilization, who came to them in company with steamers, locomotives, electric telegraphs, and printing machines. They would take a ship's steward to teach them moral philosophy and a retired coachman to instruct them in physics. Naturally this unquestioning confidence, repeatedly abused, changed ultimately into distrust. But it must be recorded to the credit of the Japanese that the latter sentiment never equalled the former in intensity. At no time did they doubt the foreigner as profoundly as they had once believed in him. The reaction from their mood of unquerying veneration was nevertheless strong. It began about the year 1873 and culminated in 1880. Of course we have to be content with approximations. Two events, however, serve in some degree as finger-posts. Both belong to the sphere of education. The first was the inauguration of a system of examinations to determine the competence of foreigners applying for "professorships" in the newly established schools and colleges of the empire; the second, the re-introduction of the Confucian system of ethics into those institutions. A peculiar idea the former, our readers will perhaps say. Yes, but not altogether an extravagant idea, as will be admitted when we record that, at one of the early examinations, an aspirant for the chair of English literature in the first Japanese college (Kaiseigakko) described himself as having "saled in a steam yott" and warned all women against becoming "intoxicated with the suttal essense of flatry;" and at another, a would-be professor of mathematics scouted the extravagant idea of being asked to solve a quadratic equation. It was like the "cheek" of the Japanese, he declared, to think that they had any business with quadratic equations, or that a foreigner versed in such arcana of algebra would come to seek employment in their double-dashed country. Mr. FUKUOKA presided at the Educational Department in 1880 when Confucianism was restored to the throne from which it had been rudely pulled down thirteen years previously. The restoration was complete. Primers, text-books, regulations, moral and ethical precepts, everything took the colour of the old Chinese philosophy. To those in authority no less comprehensive measure seemed likely to save the nation from forgetting that it had a past. For four years the pendulum remained steady in the conservative branch of the arc, and then it swung back again, rapidly and steadily. Two things were directly responsible for this reflex action: one, Marquis ITO'S return from Europe, whither he had proceeded to investigate the principles and practice of constitutional government; the other, the first passage of the Treaty Revision problem into the region of really practical politics. Thenceforth, during a second quadrennial period, Marquis ITO and Count INOUYE set the note to which the nation was expected to tune its mood. None of Japan's modern statesmen has ever known his country's needs better than these two statesmen knew them. But perhaps they were over-wise; perhaps the march of their ideas outpaced the capacities of their countrymen. At all events the nation lagged behind, and when, in 1887, Viscount TANI collected the conservative and reactionary sentiments of the time and embodied them in his celebrated memorial, the two great leaders of enlightened Liberalism found themselves standing alone, far in advance of the bulk of their nationals. It was then that the eclectic conservatism (kokusui hoson) of Young Japan struggled into existence. It was then that the rising generation, and the grey beards whom the wave of reaction had raised from obscurity, united their voices in a protest against codes of law modelled wholly on lines of Occidental jurisprudence; against the adoption of Christianity without Japanese modifications; against the employment of foreigners in posts which the Japanese student thought himself qualified to fill; against everything unadulteratedly alien. For a time the tide of conservatism was stemmed partially by the country's changeless hope of gaining friendly admittance to the comity of Western nations. But at last, in 1893, when conciliatory means seemed incapable of compassing that end, a new device was adopted—the device of rendering the old treaties irksome by insisting on their strict enforcement. Probably such a plan would never have received wide endorsement had it not been converted into the principal plank of a political party. The strength of the conservatives and of the eclectics alone could scarcely have popularized a manœuvre so petulant and so short-sighted. Happily its worst developments were paralysed by the strenuous opposition of the Liberal Party, but it nevertheless gave birth to one deformity which disfigured the country's foreign policy for years, the prejudice against foreign ownership of land in Japan. We are now, apparently, entering another epoch of liberal reaction. The country begins to recognise its error in the matter of land, and some of the educational bigotry which even Marquis ITO and Count INOUYE could not venture to assail, is likely to suffer short shrift at the hands of Mr. OZAKI YUKIO and Count OKUMA. Marquis ITO did not venture to extend official recognition to private schools where Confucianism was not taught, or where Christian ethics found a place in the curriculum. He showed his respect for modern learning by attaching a special value to the graduation certificates of the Imperial University, but even his courageous arm could not reach the stupendous abuse of power by which educational facilities were denied to the children of all really religious parents. If the present Cabinet accomplishes nothing beyond the removal of that abuse, it will still have justified its accession to office.

Our readers will ask, perhaps, why we recall these things. We answer that we desire to correct some erroneous ideas now finding expression in the columns of vernacular journals; ideas which, if they pass unchallenged, will surely have misleading results sooner or later. Political writers—and among them we observe with regret an authority so respectable as the Fiji Shimpo—are seeking to prove that Confucianism's re-introduction into the national education was a device of the Clan Statesmen to check the liberal and progressive tendency which threatened at that time to disturb their tenure of power; that the encouragement given to German philosophy and German systems, in 1883, at the expense of English and American, was another weapon of the same kind; that the special value attached to University graduation certificates had for its purpose the enlistment of learning in the cause of Clannism; and that official discrimination in favour of public schools as against private, was intended to turn students' minds solely towards Government appointments. All that is ingenious, but irreconcilable with historical accuracy. The nation was not as malleable in the hands of the "Clan Statesmen" as partisan writers of to-day would have us believe, nor did the "Clan Statesmen" ever seek to mould it in such strict accordance with their own selfish interests. If party feeling runs too high at present to permit the Japanese to be grateful to the makers of modern Japan, we foreigners, at any rate, must be allowed to separate ourselves from the unjust mob of detractors. We have watched with open eyes the processes by which this State has been raised to the position of prosperity and consideration it now occupies among the nations of the world, and when we hear the present generation blindly and unjustly inveighing against the men to whom it owes so much, the effect is only to augment our wonder that with such unappreciative materials they could achieve such results.

THE MURDER OF A GERMAN STOKER.

At the Yokohama Court on Tuesday, Katsumata Eisaku, aged 19th, living at 10, Yoshihama-cho, was charged with fatally wounding the German stoker Rischke, who was found beaten to death in the street on July 7th.

The accused denied the assault, and the Public Procurator asked for a conviction under article 299, which allows of some mitigation of sentence on the plea of self-defence.

The counsel for the accused urged that the evidence was not sufficient to justify a conviction.

Eisaku was sentenced to two years' major imprisonment.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The resolutions relating to the Dōshisha passed at the Annual Meeting of the missionaries of the American Board held at Kobe in July are given in No. 780 of the Kirisutokyō-Shumbun. President Yokoi having expressed a desire that if possible some way of bringing the Trustees and the Missionaries into harmony with each other should be devised, and having made certain proposals in reference to the School of Divinity now attached to the Institution, the Missionaries of the Board, assembled in conference, passed the following resolutions:—(1) We are much pleased to find that President Yokoi desires union. We also are actuated by the same desire. (2) We are glad to know what are President Yokoi's opinions on the subject in dispute. (3) There are some things which have been made clear by President Yokoi's explanations which hitherto were obscure to us. (4) By what has been said we perceive that our views in reference to the great difference between us and the present Trustees have not been mistaken. (5) It is quite evident that the basis of the moral education imparted at the various schools connected with the Association is not Christian. (6) We affirm that it is impossible for the Dōshisha to escape from the charge of moral culpability in changing the Rules of the Association. (7) The devotion of money given by Mr. Harris for the teaching of science by strictly Christian teachers, for evangelisation, or other sacred purposes, to the support of schools that do not make Christianity the basis of their moral teaching, is quite incapable of being justified. (8) We are unable to see in the present Dōshisha any basis of union or joint effort. Until the institution is made thoroughly Christian and evangelical it is impossible that we can connect ourselves with it. (9) In desiring that the Dōshisha should be made what it was at first, or that the money subscribed for its support should be refunded to the donors, we are at one with the American Board of Foreign Missions. (10) In order to facilitate the making of arrangements for effecting the purpose referred to above, we have appointed a Committee, whose duty it will be state the grounds of our present discontent and to propose a basis of union for the future.*

In No. 782 of the Kirisutokyō Shimbun, Mr. Abe Isoo comments on these resolutions in the following terms. At last the real significance of the Dōshisha question, which has been so long before the public, has been made clear. It appears that what I suspected all along is the case. What has really happened is not truly described by saying that the rules of the Association have been broken by the present trustees. It is rather an instance of the inevitable conflict between the new and old theology. In resolution No. 5 it is said that it has been clearly demonstrated that the moral education imparted at the various Dōshisha Schools is not Christian. The reason given for this assertion is that these schools make the Imperial Rescript on education the basis of their moral teaching. But what grounds are there for thinking that anything contained in this Rescript is hostile to Christianity, any more than to Confucianism or Buddhism? The Imperial Rescript only touches on the subject of practical morality, urging its necessity, but not dwelling on the means to be used for compassing this end. It is for Christians to interpret the Imperial Rescript their own way. There are other schools besides those belonging to the Dōshisha which have the status of Ordinary Middle Schools and yet which can remain Christian without lying open to the charge of neglecting to fulfil the conditions laid down in the Imperial Rescript. Resolution No. 5 does not state the real objection that the Board Missionaries have to the present Dōshisha. This is expressed in Resolution No. 8. It is not to the changing of the letter of the rules that they object, but to the altering of the character of the institution. They wish to make it an institution manned by earnest evangelical Christians. Hence it may be affirmed that even the restoration of the old rules would fail to satisfy them. They want not the name and form of the old institution merely but its substance and reality. It is Christian doctrine that they contend for. The question is a theological one, namely, shall a certain class of religious teaching be exclusively carried on in the Dōshisha, or not? But can the present Dōshisha accept the proposal made? Acceptance means submission. It will be no case of working together: the one party will lead, the other follow. Mr. Niijima succeeded in blending Japanese and foreign elements, but circumstances have altered, and it is plain that the conduct of the institution can not be entrusted to two heads—one foreign the other native. If Dr. Davis' proposal were carried out and the institution were started afresh with only evangelical Christian Japanese as teachers, it would not be long before discord arose. Men holding advanced opinions, men of liberal principles, would appear among the teaching faculty. It would be then necessary to ask those professors to resign. It would thus mean that to all time the institution would have to subject itself to a certain class of ideas, that a veto would be placed on all free theological thought. Even where only a school of divinity is concerned, the forbidding of freedom of thought must be attended with great disadvantages, and how much more would this prove the case in a school of the Dōshisha type, which has never been a mere theological seminary. The plan of requiring that an institution should always represent traditional teaching of a fixed type may answer in a country like America, where men have learnt to inherit their faith as they inherit property and other things; but in Japan where a great variety of opinion on the subject of religion is allowed, to bind an institution to teach only one set of doctrines is certainly very impolitic. Evangelical Christianity is only one form of Christianity. To ignore all other forms is to imitate the intolerance of the Roman Catholics. I feel confident that a Dōshisha thus trammelled could never develop into anything great: there could be no thorough education and even the evangelisation aimed at by the Missionaries could not but end in failure. I am in favour of choosing Christian doctrines that rest on something more than tradition and custom and of sowing Christian seed in soil that has been well prepared by Buddhists and Confucianists, and of thus securing a rich harvest. The missionaries are dissatified with the Dōshisha because it is not sufficiently conservative, evangelical, and dogmatic. I am in favour of granting to the institution, in learning and religion alike, great freedom of inquiry. If liberty of thought be guaranteed by the missionaries, I have no cause for disagreement with them. We can work together. This Dōshisha question is no other than a conflict between old and new ideas.

The Waseda Bungaku, under the title of Danjo Fuzoku Mondai, discusses the evils connected with concubinage in Japan. It is very difficult, says this organ, to interest men in the subject. Most of them regard women as mere playthings created for the amusement of the opposite sex. For a long time past the Yorozu Chōhō has been engaged in publishing minute details bearing on concubinage. From July 7th to July 29th some 230 instances of men who keep concubines were quoted. The comment of the Waseda Bungaku on this performance is not favourable. It says that many of the facts given by the Yorozu Chōhō are misleading and convey impressions that are far from true. In some cases, says the Waseda Bungaku, there are special reasons for the existence of concubines. The indiscriminate condemnation of the Yorozu Chōhō is not to be commended. The Waseda Bungaku proceeds to notice the discussion of monogamy which has been carried on in the pages of the Bukkyō, Mr. Nishimura's lecture on concubinage and the various references to the subject in the columns of the Jiji Shimpō. Mr. Fukuzawa has rightly pointed out that the law in Japan has not in the past given to woman the rights she can justly claim. Then authorities on education are always recommending such books as the Onna Daigaku and the Onna Imagawa as furnishing suitable precepts for women—works whose teaching is all based on the Chinese view of woman's place in Society. The difficulties of effecting the proposed reform are many, but it is plain that the two principal forces to rely on are education and the law. The Waseda Bungaku notes that the children of concubines are recognised by the new Civil Code of Japan.

The Yorozu Chōhō is fond of posing as a great moral reformer, but by a large number of discerning readers it is regarded rather as a sensational scandal-monger of a most unscrupulous type, which publishes much more falsehood than truth. When sensation is the chief object to be attained by the publication of news, truth and falsehood become very secondary considerations.

The Hongkong Daily Press gives credence to a report of a recent rising in the island of Hainan. The report indicates a renewed success of the Triad Society, a band of thieves and rebels who have been increased and strengthened by a hungry horde of pirates from the sea-coast, and this lawless army has committed many depredations by looting and burning a number of villages in the Hoihow country. The British Consul, Mr. Butler, appealed to the Taotai on the 19th August to protect the threatened Americans, and accordingly a company of soldiers were sent to the scene of strife and they succeeded in rescuing the missionaries and their families, and escorted them from Nodoa, in the Tamchow district of Kiungchow, to Hoihow, leaving all their property to the care of the Chinese officials.

* We have shortened several of the resolutions, giving only the principal points.—(Writer of the Summary.)

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

On the whole the assailants of the Cabinet show some signs of weariness, though the vehemence of their onsets would still be remarkable did it not suffer by comparison. The Jiji Shimpo seems to have now joined the chorus of journals that recommend a separation of the Constitutional Party into its original elements. It declares that division is inevitable. The Liberals and Progressists differ from each other in all essential points and can not possibly work in harmony. But the question is —have they courage to divide? They joined hands to obtain administrative power, not because they were agreed as to the best manner of employing it, but because they coveted it. The same covetousness will prevent either of them from abandoning the prize. The Osaka Asahi compares the Liberals and the Progressists to an ill-matched husband and wife, who quarrel perpetually but can not agree to separate. Marquis Ito, profoundly astute, understood the dilemma in which they would be placed if they accepted the responsibilities of government in their then state of unreadiness. He set a trap for them, and they fell into it. The rivalry of Satsuma and Choshiu never exhibited such unsightly aspects or constituted such an impediment to progress as the squabbles between the two parties now in possession of administrative power. The Kokumin Shimbun finds another simile. It likens the cabinet to a half-killed snake, which can neither advance, nor retreat, nor remain quiet. In point of fact, a fundamental error was made. Count Okuma went wrong from the outset. He should have commenced by submitting his own views clearly to the Emperor. Then he should have ascertained whether he had the Party's mandate and whether it was prepared to place entire confidence in him. He neglected both of those essential preliminaries, and the result is disaster. The Kokumin, while penning these criticisms, professes friendship and admiration for Count Okuma. The Nippon's view is that party cabinets are a necessary outcome of the conditions of the time, and it declares that both Marquis Ito and Count Matsukata recognised the fact. But the party cabinet which the time has brought forth is conspicuously defective in two respects, namely, that the Departments of War and of the Navy stand beyond the range of its control, and that the parties supporting it are disunited and have no common platform. Further, they labour under a fatal misconception. They regard party cabinets as an end instead of recognising them to be only a means to an end. The fate of such blundering will soon find them out. We need scarcely say that the Nichi Nichi Shimbun also runs its usual tilt at the Ministry. Indeed, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun is the Cabinet's most dangerous foe, for its attacks are conceived with conspicuous ability and delivered with great adroitness. Referring to the question of political officials and administrative officials, it observes that the distinction between them is based not upon their moral qualifications or educational advantages, but merely upon rules of expediency dictated by the practice of countries having representative institutions. Now it is understood that the revised Law of Election, a draft of which has been prepared by the Government for submitting to the Diet next session, contains clauses forbidding administrative officials to be members of parliament or of political parties. Political officials, on the other hand, are to be members of parties or of Parliament, and are all to go out of office simultaneously with the Cabinet. But the Ministers of State themselves are political officials. How, then, is this rule to be applied in the case of the Ministers of the Army and Navy? Will they consent to go out of office if the Cabinet resigns? "Party politicians," concludes the Nichi Nichi, "see details but overlook essentials."

A good deal of journalistic attention is devoted to the projected alteration of the regulations for the appointment of officials. According to the present system, all applicants for office below the rank of Chokunin must pass a qualifying examination, graduates of the Imperial University being alone excepted from the rule. There are but 290 Chokunin officials in the civil service, and since only a fraction of these accompany an outgoing Cabinet into retirement, it follows that the number of vacancies available for an incoming party is not large. The difficulty presents itself with special force at present, for the numerous phalanx of party politicians allied with the new Cabinet have had no share in either the responsibilities or the sweets of office for some twenty years, and it seems unreasonable in their eyes that the advent of their leaders to administrative power should not immediately open a door for their own preferment. The easiest exit from the embarrassment would be to alter the regulations so as to dispense with the necessity of examination in the case of all persons who have satisfied other tests of public capacity. Were that change effected, every vacancy in the ranks of officialdom, without distinction of Chokunin, Sōnin, or Hannin, would be a prize coming within reach of party politicians. The question is not regarded, we need scarcely say, merely as a matter of "the spoils to the victor." It is contended that, owing to the protracted duration of the fight between the party politicians and the "clan statesmen," and owing to the former's consequent abstention from official life, the country has been deprived of the services of men competent to advance its interests but not now capable of undergoing the educational test prescribed by the regulations. The problem is understood to be under consideration by the Cabinet, but nothing can be confidently predicted about the latter's decision. The Mainichi Shimbun, however, says that official views are likely to favour the following modifications of the regulations:—first, that the higher offices—that is to say, Chokunin and Sōnin offices —shall be open without examination not merely to graduates of the Imperial University, but also to graduates of colleges receiving special official recognition, to members of the Imperial Diet, to barristers, and to members of City and Prefectural Assemblies, provided that these last shall be eligible for appointments in local Governments only; secondly, that the lower offices —namely, those of Hannin grade—shall be open without examination to graduates of Middle Schools and other educational institutions of equal status, to Headmen of Urban and Rural Districts, and to members of communal assemblies.

It need hardly be observed that these changes are condemned in the bitterest terms by the Opposition journals. They declare that instead of abolishing the abuses of patronage and favouritism which were the chief counts in the arraignment of the "Clan Statesmen," the party politicians are busily extending the arena for the exercise of those abuses, and that the spectacle presented to the nation on the inauguration of party cabinets is that of a mob of politicians scrambling for official emoluments, and so hungry for administrative posts that they have no time for anything except the devising of means to satisfy their appetite. The Chuo Shimbun declares that not improvement (Kai-kaku) but disimprovement (kai-aku) is the rôle of the first party cabinet, and that the nation is already beginning to grow utterly weary of this display of impotence after such loudly asserted claims to great resolves and such wholesale promises of large reforms. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun discusses the question in a more practical and detailed manner. It contends that any alteration of the regulations would be unconstitutional, because the XIXth Article of the Constitution says:—"Japanese subjects may, according to qualifications determined in laws or ordinances, be appointed to civil or military or any other offices equally"; and it denies that a cabinet has power to declare any special class of persons eligible for office, seeing that the Xth article of the Constitution reserves to the Emperor the prerogative of appointing and dismissing all officials. To this somewhat far-fetched line of argument our contemporary adds the solid and unanswerable objection that the proper discharge of official duties demands special qualifications of experience and training, and that it would be extravagantly reckless to pitchfork men into administrative posts merely because they had given evidence of political ability or party fidelity. That objection applies with special force to members of the Diet or of Local assemblies. Their qualification is simply a property one, and no person will be so silly as to pretend that the payment of a certain amount of taxes every year constitutes a proof of competence to discharge official duties. The proposal is a mere manœuvre to provide food for the hungry maws of party politicians.

Of course the telegram announcing the Czar's proposal for disarmament has evoked many comments from vernacular newspapers. They do not, on the whole, take it very seriously. Some, indeed refrain, from comment, being apparently uncertain how to treat the idea, but those that have spoken are either emphatically hostile or coldly indifferent. The Kokumin Shimbun scoffs at the notion that Japan should think of suspending the expansion of her armaments in deference to a proposal of the kind. Doubtless the project commends itself strongly to Russia from the point of view of her own convenience. In the sequel of her operations during the past four years she has succeeded in obtaining a unique position among the nations, and it would suit her excellently to be now insured against any attempts to disturb her. But it is not dedifficult to termine from her conduct since 1895 whether peace is the genuine object of her desires. Is it likely that the nations will endorse a suggestion framed solely in the interests of Russia's expediency? Further, is Russia a country whose uniform respect for her agreements would warrant the States of the world in trusting her to observe a covenant of the kind now proposed? An answer to that question may be found in the story of the Black Sea and the Treaty of Paris, and in the story of Batoum. "We desire peace," says the Kokumin in conclusion, "but it must be peace with honour, not the peace of subserviency. We do not want peace accorded to us by the tolerance of others. We want peace assured by our own strength." The Nippon approaches the problem by a species of catechism. Is the news credible, it asks? And if credible, is the Czar in earnest? And if he is in earnest, will the Powers take his proposition seriously? And if they take it seriously, how will their conference eventuate? What basis can be adopted for limiting a State's armaments? A financial basis will not do, neither will a territorial. It seems that population alone could be taken as a standard. For example, it might be decided that a country with ten million inhabitants should have one soldier or one ton of shipping to every 100 of its population; a country of fifty millions, one soldier and one ton to every 150, and more populous countries, one to every 200. But the trouble would be, how to enforce the rule; how to punish violations of it. Probably the real purpose of the project is to further some scheme of union. The Hochi attributes the Czar's action to Russia's financial troubles, but is nevertheless convinced that Japan should send a delegate to the Conference of Powers, if one takes place, especially since Count Okuma has declared that foreign policy is simply a question of upright dealing. The Shogyo Shimpo is still more outspoken. It attributes Russia's action to the same cause, financial embarrassment. The race has become too fast for her. She finds that her resources will not permit her to keep up with Powers like Great Britain and the United States, and she has thus been induced to advance this strange proposition. Japan can not entertain it for a moment. It is, in fact, a wholly untenable idea from the point of view of any Eastern State. Better reject it promptly and not sow any seeds of future regret. The Jiji Shimpo is altogether sceptical. It can not treat the proposition seriously, but regards it as a manœuvre of the moment. If the Powers were induced to come to some agreement, what guarantees could they give of its observances? Would not the State with which the scheme originated be itself the most likely to violate it? The Chuo declares that Russia can not be trusted. Japan must not allow herself to be deceived. She must pursue her own policy unflinchingly, for her own needs are her first consideration.

JAPANESE FACTS AND COMMENTS.

Imports at Kobe are accumulating day by day, says the Nippon. The depression of trade in the interior and the tightness of the money market have almost crippled leading merchants in Osaka. These merchants, anticipating that the revised tariff would come into operation from September this year, had contracted with foreign firms to have their orders supplied before that period. In these orders were included muslin, Italian cloths, cotton, satin, and woollen manufactures, which altogether amounted in value to 100 million yen. Arrivals of these commodities have been steady and continuous, but since the date of the operation of the revised tariff has now been fixed for January next, the native merchants, beset with difficulties keener than ever, are unable to take delivery of goods imported to their order. Goods stored in the warehouses of foreign merchants on this account have reached an enormous amount. Of these commodities the principal are fine threads and yarn from England (known in Japan as gasuito), muslin and piece goods, paper, &c., which altogether aggregate 3 million yen in value. Piece goods occupy the most prominent position among non-delivered goods, being valued at over one million yen. The foreign merchants lately applied to the Chamber of Commerce in the Settlement, asking for the adoption of special measures. A committee of three was accordingly appointed and despatched to Osaka to urge the merchants there to fulfil their contracts. As for Yokohama, the amount accumulated there is reported to have reached 60 million yen.

The Governor-General of Formosa recently issued a notification for the control of tea dealers in the island. It provides for the establishment of tea-guilds which shall be charged with the duties of stopping the manufacture of spurious tea, and effecting an improvement in the quality of the leaf and an extension of markets. These guilds will also have powers of arbitration in regard to disputes connected with the tea trade. Fines are provided for.

Formosa suffers at present from want of money. A loan of 100 yen claims in some places a daily interest of over 30 sen. The establishment of a bank in the island is a pressing want, but the financial situation at present is extremely unfavourable to the inauguration of such a scheme.

On the 29th instant the brokers of the Tokyo Rice Exchange held a general meeting at which resolutions were passed agreeing that the standard of quality of foreign rice should be altered, and in order to carry out the decision a committee of five should be appointed from among the brokers and charged with the duty of making necessary arrangements.

The Japan Trading Company in Kyoto, having failed to meet a promissory note for 10,672 yen, has been sued in the local court by the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, and the properties of its principal shareholders have been seized. These, according to the Nichi Nichi, now number 35, including the Directors of the Company. The shareholders in general appear to advocate the dissolution of the corporation, which has a capital of 500,000 yen in 10,000 shares of 50 yen each. Of these, 6,000 shares are owned by Mr. Bitchin, of Osaka, and his partners. Mr. Bitchin attempted to respond to the calls on shares by the sale of a certain coal mine in Hokkaido to the Company, but as soon as the fact became known to other shareholders, they deliberately refused to pay their portion—5 yen per share—due on the 15th instant, and the President and Manager simultaneously resigned their posts.

According to a report from the Japanese Consul in San Francisco, the number of immigrants from Japan seems to have reached 826—768 men and 58 women—the aggregate amount of money in their possession at the time of their landing being $42,167. Of the immigrants of various nationalities those from Japan constitute the largest number. Unfortunately they have become an object of hatred to the native labourers, and the local authorities and the press have shown a tendency to condemn them by way of protecting their own working classes. Yet Japanese labour is still in great demand. The Hispano-American war, which has considerably enhanced the wages of white labourers, has also increased the call for Japanese labour. Formerly the Japanese emigrants were chiefly employed on railways in Nevada and Idaho, few being engaged in similar work in California. The Consul, however, was lately requested by the Southern Pacific Railway Company and others to arrange for 2,000 Japanese labourers, although these companies seemed unwilling to make an open application, lest by so doing they might lose popularity with their own countrymen. The wages obtained by the Japanese in Nevada and Idaho vary from $1 to $1.20. An anti-Japanese movement is growing in these two provinces in view of the steady increase in immigration. It is doubtful whether the Japanese will not encounter the same fate as the Chinese; nor is it improbable that commercial relations between Japan and United States may be greatly impaired. The problem is beset with serious difficulties, and does not permit of any hasty solution. If the Japanese Government is inclined to continue the policy of emigration, it must restrict the emigrants to such as are perfectly qualified for landing, and endeavour to avoid landing a large number at once, while at the same time steps must be taken to select, in compliance with the Immigration Regulations of the United States, a number of overseers who are not only possessed of a certain amount of property, but also are fully sensible of their responsibility, and familiar with the conditions of the country with which they are to be connected.

An interesting article from the pen of Mr. Kawashima Jun on private and government railways is published in the Nippon. He says that in order to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the question of State purchase, reference is necessary to the various railway systems of Europe. The railways of Japan, it must be noticed, are owned either by Government or by private individuals under State supervision. But the private companies are very powerful, and have behind them huge capitals. Their profits are insignificant as compared with the amount realized by the European lines. They have no financial strength to improve or extend their enterprises by independent resources. In order to make them thoroughly efficient for military and commercial purposes, the following programme should be adopted:—(1) A Central Railway Superintendence Bureau should be established for the control of lines throughout the Empire. (2) As to railways already completed and receiving special subsidies from the Government, arrangements may be made to entrust the Central Superintendence Bureau with the management of their traffic, the Government in this case guaranteeing a dividend of 5 per cent. on the shares. (3) With regard to Government railways already finished, shares may be issued as in the case of private railways. (4) Railways for which no special subsidies are granted should also be entitled to have their traffic carried on by the Central Superintendence Bureau. Thus all lines would be maintained and owned by the people, but traffic would be worked by the Government, so that improvement and development could be carried to the highest point. To urge the necessity of State ownership of railways from a defensive or financial point of view is an argument which can not secure public sympathy.

According to the Shogyo, investigations in regard to the monopoly of camphor in Formosa were recently completed. A gentleman who is familiar with this branch of trade reports that the camphor monopoly, unlike transactions in sugar, salt, &c., necessitates direct management on the part of the Government. No accurate accounts are yet to hand, but as various arrangements are required in the first year of cultivation, no profit is likely to be obtained for some time. But in two or three years the camphor trade promises to be one of the chief sources of revenue in the island. Foreigners who are at present engaged in the manufacture of camphor find that their terms will expire in February or March of the 33rd year of Meiji, and the Government may commence working the monopoly by that time. The recent over-production of camphor seems to have led to a serious depreciation in prices, and not a few foreign manufacturers have recognised the wisdom of suspending production for the present. The enterprise is one that should be taken into the hands of the Government.

The Official Gazette of the 1st instant publishes an Imperial Ordinance setting forth the organization of a Special Land Assessment Bureau in Formosa. The new Bureau is to be placed under the direct control of the Governor General, its functions being the investigation of title deeds and registers of land, as well as the preparation of maps. Its personnel consists of a President of chokunin rank (the post being held by the President of the Administrative Bureau), a number of commissioners, clerks, experts, and assistants. The right of establishing provincial branches of the Bureau is reserved to the Governor General, but the position of chiefs of these branches is to be occupied by local Governors.

The Shogyo accuses the present Cabinet of inconsistency. The former Progressists, it remarks, were obstinately opposed to the scheme for increased taxation if not accompanied by administrative reform. The Cabinet has already completed the necessary investigations for the latter purpose, and is now in a position to adopt measures for the proposed increase of taxes, but, strange to say, it still shrinks from carrying the project into practice. As a matter of fact, the question of administrative reform is inseparable from the proposed scheme for increased taxation. Simultaneously with the augmentation of burdens upon the people to supply the deficiency in revenue, a necessity exists for the curtailment of useless expenditures which exist in the various sections of the Government. The people's objection to increased taxation has had its origin simply in the Government's failure to effect an appropriate reduction in its expenditures. The Cabinet, the Shogyo adds, is torn by internal dissension, and has not courage even to curtail needless administrative expenditures or to carry out the scheme for increased taxation lest it might happen to incur the displeasure of the landowners. Nothing good can be expected from such a weak and unprincipled Ministry.

At a recent meeting of the Doshi Club the following resolutions were passed unanimously:—(1) That steps be taken to sweep out the clan elements from the central and local authorities. (2) That abuses connected with party partisans be eradicated, and a path be opened for men of talents. It was directed that the above resolutions should be "submitted to the Ministry for immediate adoption." The Doshi Club is evidently a sanguine body.

The problem of the State ownership of private railways continues to attract serious attention. In the Cabinet the question has been earnestly taken up by Count Itagaki, the Home Minister, and Mr. Hayashi, the Minister of Communications. It is said that they are supported by the Ministers of War and the Navy, as well as the Minister of Finance. Among private individuals the members of the Finance Investigation Society, together with the Mitsui family, are reported to be in favour of State purchase. With these names among the supporters of the scheme it cannot be lightly considered. The two Ministers—Count Itagaki and Mr. Hayashi—are stated to have resolved upon submitting the question to the 13th session of the Diet, and, although the project may fail to secure the unanimous approval of the Cabinet, it will nevertheless be introduced in the Diet in the form of a representation. The advocates of the State ownership of railways have, remarks the Yomiuri, accumulated a vast amount of funds for canvassing at the time of the next session, and it is not altogether improbable that the policy of "purchase" may be employed to secure a majority in the Diet. But it must be noticed that if such a result is achieved, it will inevitably lead to changes in the Cabinet, and from that point of view the issue of the railway question may be the direct cause of a rupture in the present Ministry.

Another Notification relating to Formosa states the alterations in the Opium Regulations to be enforced from the 10th instant. The prominent features are a reduction in the period of punishment and an increase in fines. Unlicensed importers or manufacturers of opium paste, for instance, are now to be subjected to major imprisonment for five years only, or to a fine of not more than 5,000 yen. The import or manufacture of raw or powdered opium involves major imprisonment for not more than four years or a fine of not more than 4 000 yen, and the cultivation or retention of poppies or the juice thereof with a view to manufacturing the same into opium, is punishable with major confinement for a term not exceeding 2 years or a fine of not more than 2,000 yen. Illicit importation or manufacture of opium-smoking utensils is punishable by imprisonment for not more than 3 years or a fine of not more than 3 000 yen. Should the above offences be committed by the Custom House Authorities, the penalty is to be increased by one degree. Any person providing another with utensils or places for smoking is liable to a penalty of major confinement for a period of not more than 4 years or a fine not exceeding 4,000 yen. Illegal smokers of opium are to be punished with not more than 3 years' imprisonment or a fine of not more than 3000 yen. The person convicted has the option of commuting any portion of the term of imprisonment by paying proportionate fines.

A certain business man—a man of wonderful ideas — writes in the columns of the Yomiuri in regard to the difficulty of introducing foreign capital. The necessity of foreign funds, he says, is beyond question, but nothing has yet been achieved in the way of their utilization. There must be causes for this. The high rate of interest paid in Japan is the most prominent. As a millionaire would refuse, in spite of his wealth, to lend money to the poor, so foreigners, rich as they are, could never be induced to commit the folly of issuing loans without substantial security. Moreover, the abnormal rates of interest now ruling in the market have deterred, and still continue to deter, aliens from complying with loan negotiations at low rates. Not only will they insist on the same interest as that which prevails in the Japanese market, but an attempt is also likely to be made to provide that the loans shall be unredeemed for ten or even twenty years. Rates of interest are not unchangeable, and the 7 per cent. of to-day may fall to 4 or 5 per cent. several years hence. But if foreign loans unredeemable for a long period are obtained at the present high rate, interest will have to be paid at 7 per cent. even if the market price of money falls to 4 or 5 per cent. The financial situation of Japan, however embarrassing it may appear, does not permit the introduction of foreign capital at such exorbitant rates as 6 or 7 per cent. to be spread over a large number of years. From these facts it may be inferred that foreign funds could never be expected to flow into Japan until the rates of interest prevailing among the Japanese are reduced.

The prison system under the revised treaties is a question, says the Nippon, which now occupies the attention of the Government. Of course no difference can be made as to the enforcement of criminal sentences between foreigners and natives; but in the event of foreigners being taken to prison they will have to be dealt with according to their own customs as well as with regard to the nature of their offences. Such discrimination, however, is not to be taken as unfairly favouring the foreign as compared with the Japanese offender. It is impossible to force foreigners accustomed to meat to eat rice mixed with barley, or to sit in Japanese fashion in jail. The result of such treatment would be, in some cases, illness, and it would invite the discontent of foreign Governments. This does not mean to say, however, that foreigners ought to be provided with ordinary full European fare; it simply means that their food must be prepared in a manner tolerable to them. Their rice gruel, for instance, may contain meat and vegetables, and common chairs may be furnished to those who are unable to sit as the Japanese. It is true that some foreigners have become perfectly habituated to the Japanese mode of living, but others can scarcely be expected to endure the hardships of prison if their customs and manners are entirely disregarded. Communications have been frequently received from Foreign Governments on this subject, and it has now been decided that the policy of prison reform shall be steadily pursued.

On the 30th ultimo, a member of the Kokumin's staff interviewed Count Itagaki, who expressed his views on the subject of prisons as follows:—The complaint at present consists in the imperfection of prison buildings, in consequence of which no satisfactory regulations can be established. Moreover, there is a lack of competent men, this being due to the fact that neither in emolument or credit is there anything to attract good men to the work. There may be cause for uneasiness on the part of foreigners who inspect Japanese prisons, especially those in the country. Rumour has it that many have communicated the results of their observations to their own countries, but it is extremely doubtful whether their reports have been prepared with sufficient care to show the real condition of the jails of Japan. A certain Russian, after inspecting the Nagasaki prison, published his remarks in a newspaper, but these remarks were nothing but a mass of gross errors and falsehoods, except as regarded certain quotations from reports compiled by an Englishman, which were nearly free from errors. Measures for the improvement of the prisons must be taken in the most urgent cases. When formerly I held the portfolio of Home Affairs I advocated the policy of providing separate cells for criminals, that is to say, making a distinction as to the age of culprits and the nature of their offences. I have also entertained special views in regard to giving them moral lectures for their correction, and it was my desire to have statistics compiled for each prison. I caused the materials to be collected from all parts of the empire, but the Government failed to put them into a proper shape. If these statistics be completed, it will be possible to discern the peculiarities of different provinces and provide accordingly. As a preliminary to prison reform I have determined to dismiss aged superintendents, and to convene a special meeting of wardens on the 15th instant, in order that necessary enquiries may be made or instructions issued for the adoption of a system of separation, and for the enforcement of precautions in regard to the treatment of prisoners. As for alteration in the prison regulations, steps will be taken to issue an Imperial Ordinance or to acquire the approval of the Diet. Foreigners are apt to make a needless fuss about the question of prisons. Even foreigners when they commit crime are criminals, and criminals, even in the west, belong in most cases to the lower classes who are not in ordinary times handsomely lodged. As I have already remarked, however, the present prison buildings are far from being satisfactory, and I intend making gradual improvements in them, especially in regard to those in the open ports and the leading cities. As for expenses, the Treasury, I think, ought to bear the burden, and the matter is now under investigation. Changes in this respect will probably be enforced from the 32nd fiscal year (1899).

Investigations carried out by the Tokyo Keizai Zasshi show that at the end of June this year the tonnage of Japanese steamers aggregated 437,413 and that of sailing vessels 65,364, a total of 502,777 tons. Compared with the tonnage of steamers and sailing vessels registered at the end of December, the 26th year of Meiji, the figures stand thus:—

	At the end of June, 1898. Tons.	At the end of Dec., 1893. Tons.
Steamships	437,413	110,205
Sailing vessels	65,364	44,967
Total	502,777	155,172

Thus the aggregate tonnage has increased threefold. But, asks our contemporary, how about the progress of the Navy? The following comparative figures will show the ratio of cruisers to the merchantmen placed under their protection:—

	Prior to the war with China.	At present.
Number of cruisers	9	11
Tonnage	33 024	40,051

Thus the increase in cruisers and their tonnage does not exceed 2 and 7,027 respectively. Larger expansion of the navy is not only absolutely indispensable for defensive purposes, but also as a means of protection for the mercantile marine.

With regard to the question of State ownership of railways, a certain financier, according to the Tokyo Shimbun, urges the following programme:—(1) The Government, after consultation with the railway companies, should issue bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest per annum. (2) The bonds to be redeemed within five years from the date of issue, with fund to be raised in the form of Private Railway Bonds. (3) The accounts relating to the above railways to be excluded from the ordinary budgets of revenue and expenditure, and reports thereof to be presented to the Imperial Diet every year.

According to the Nippon, the amount of coins struck at the Osaka Mint during last month was as follows:—

	Struck during August. Yen.	Total from April to August. Yen.
Gold coins	2,640,000	7,975,000
50 sen silver coins	296,000	3,875,000
20 sen do.	964 401	1,000,601
5 sen nickel coins	120,000	218,550

As a portion of the above amount has not yet been delivered to the Bank of Japan, the same can not be included in the volume of currency. A few days ago, the Mint received from the Nippon Ginko 24 or 25 boxes of gold bullion and 39 barrels of nickel. These two varieties of bullion, the one amounting to £200,000 and the other to 181,450 yen, were brought from abroad by the N.Y.K.'s steamer which arrived in Kobe on the 29th ultimo. It is said that one sen copper pieces will be struck in conformity with the new system of coinage, and put into circulation in a few months, work being commenced at the beginning of next month. The Osaka Mainichi, however, refers to alterations in design being contemplated. The Mint is now busily engaged in the manufacture of 10 yen gold, 50 sen silver, and 5 sen nickel pieces.

THE PERRY INCIDENT.

Sir,—Some months ago it was suggested by certain Japanese gentlemen of liberal tendencies that an entertainment in honour of Mr. T. S. Perry could appropriately be given to show their faith that the opening of Japan by Mr. Perry's grand-uncle had been of great benefit to Japan. These men wished to take advantage of the occasion of Mr. Perry's presence to strengthen the belief among foreigners that their country was friendly to foreigners and among Japanese that the liberal régime was irresistible. Mr. Perry's name was a hook upon which they proposed to hang these two purposes. When asked by one of those who proposed to give the entertainment whether or not the occasion was a good one, I replied that I thought all foreigners must consider it a graceful act, and I did suppose so until I read the notice of the "Perry Episode" in yesterday's Mail.

It certainly matters very little to Mr. Perry or anybody whether two unimportant Japanese papers tell a clumsy lie about him. The lie may be due in this instance to gross ignorance, gross negligence or mean and envious maliciousness. I think it must in part at least have been due to the last, because even gross negligence might have seen from the list of passengers of the Empress of China arriving July 25th that Mr. Perry's family did come to meet him.

But these brutal stories are forgivable and would have no influence whatever had the English newspapers (the Times, Mail, etc.) merely refrained from mentioning them or commenting upon them. Absolute silence on the part of the English press would have shown real consideration to Mr. Perry, and would at once have relegated these absurd stories to "innocuous desuetude." But it is much harder to see in the Japan Mail under the caption of "The Perry Episode" that the gentle attempt of certain Japanese gentlemen to show a kindly spirit to foreigners has resulted in ridicule. A de haut en bas attitude toward the entertainment and indirectly to its guest, scarcely concealing a sneer, strikes a mere observer as much worse than a stupid falsehood. An "amusing impromptu," the "Perry function," and "people laughed a little," are not quite agreeable phrases, but not dangerous, even though readers outside Japan do get a wrong impression of the affair from them. I say this in the interest of friendly relations between Japanese and foreigners not in that of Mr. Perry, who is too old a hand at the world to care what temporary gossip says about him. Surely the Mail and all of us might welcome any voluntary attention of the Japanese to a foreigner when it was kindly meant and pleasantly carried out.

TO "ELTEKON."

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—Since most every question has two sides, and since "Eltekon" confesses that he did not know my side of this present question, it is quite reasonable to conclude that he wished to know my explanation of the name of the Shepherd's Voice,—a point which I did not by any means fail to consider when the publication was begun, and which I am now prepared to defend with the Bible in hand against any man who will give his name. And I might say that "Eltekon" has no reason for concealing his name in a match of this kind. It is not a point any man should be ashamed to raise. And if the gentleman will give me his name I will send him the Shepherd's Voice, from which he can obtain my explanation to his heart's satisfaction. We are always ready to give a reason for the hope within us.

DOUBTFUL DISPUTATIONS.

Sir,—As everybody knows, certain men, prominent in Christian circles in Japan, have lately violated a solemn promise, and have virtually stolen some valuable property. The fact, if it be a fact, that their motive was vanity rather than ordinary greed of money, does not change the fact that theft (not technical theft, of course), has been committed. Yet these persons do not seem to be at all ashamed of themselves. Apparently, they have no more idea of the figure they cut in the eyes of honest men of their own creed and of no creed, than the naked coolies have of the mixture of astonishment, disgust, and contempt which their shamelessness, of another and more excusable kind, awakens in the minds of new comers from other lands.

These things are painfully obvious. But I, for one, have no curiosity to know the arguments by which these parties have worked themselves into their present state of moral obtuseness. The bare facts of the case, acknowledged by all to be facts, are more than enough to disgust a man who has any conscience or sense of honour, and to bring a blush of shame to faces of Christians, whose Master's name has been so dishonoured. Dispute about the affair is both wearisome and profitless, because it is really a dispute about tastes; or, to speak more literally, it is a dispute about the heart's affections. If these men had been governed by simple faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and loyalty to him, they could not have done the evil of which they have been guilty, because personal reverence and affection toward him would have forbidden such a course. If this affection be really present in any man, it will be manifested, sooner or later, in his conduct; if it be absent, what profit can there be in labouring to prove the evil of things whose evil is, to the loving heart and the tender conscience, self-evident? "Love rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; love doth not behave itself unseemly."

When Judas Iscariot betrayed the Lord, he must have somehow or other argued down his own conscience; otherwise he would have been powerless to act as he did. But would it be therefore pleasant or morally helpful to listen to Judas's arguments with himself, such as he doubtless made before remorse overtook him and drove him to suicide?

When a Christian man, or a party of Christian men, is so forgetful of what is due to the Master as to call any periodical, but especially a periodical whose general tone is like that of The Shepherd's Voice, by a name so shocking to the better sensibilities of every Christian of discernment, it may, possibly, be useful to call attention to the mistake. But I do not see that there could be any use at all in entering into a dispute on the subject. I have no wish to hear the editor's arguments in favour of his irreverence, nor, I think, have most of your readers.

The heading of my last letter showed that, so far as I was concerned, the question as to the name of the above-mentioned magazine was thenceforth to be left to the editor's own conscience, in the sight of God. He does not seem to have understood this, and so, Sir, I have trespassed on your space once more. I hope he will not give himself any trouble about the question of my real name, with regard to which he shows, in his last letter, some signs of curiosity; I only beg to assure him that I am no enemy of his. It is clear to me that only one person ought to be considered in connection with the question that I raised in my first letter, namely, that One who died on the Cross for our sins; who is now at the right hand of God; and whom His servants shall some day see as He is.

I remain, Sir, Yours faithfully,

ELTEKON.

A TRIP TO HOKKAIDO AND BACK.

(Written for the "Japan Mail.")

It may be that Sapporo, or some other place in Hokkaido, is to become the summer resort in Japan, but at present the distance and the difficulties in the way of reaching the northern island deter many from considering a visit thither among the possibilities of an ordinary summer.

Without going oneself it is difficult to learn much about the ways of going, or the accommodation to be had. Often those who know most about these matters will tell least, for the same reasons that those longest in a foreign land write least about it. "Spend six months," advised a well-known traveller, "in a new country and then begin to write about it." A vacation trip should be written about during that trip or the experiences may seem trivial and of nothing worth. For the benefit of others who may be thinking of a run to the north next year I shall put down those things that I would fain have known two months ago. It would be better, perhaps, to leave the notes unpublished till next spring, but for the hope that others will tell of their experiences, presenting other glasses than mine with which to view the trip.

In going to Sapporo from Yokohama one has the choice of a voyage of five days by sea, or a journey of some 24 hours by rail to Aomori, 15 or 18 by boat to Mororan, and finally 8 or 10 by rail to Sapporo. We chose the former, and being now at sea with no railway time tables at hand I can not vouch for the accuracy of the above figures. From Yokohama this summer the steamers of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have left three times a week. Most of them are of about 1,500 tons register; some supply foreign food, and a few are commanded by foreign captains. I have heard the advice, with regard to steamers on this route, "Avoid those that have foreign captains." Whether it be good or not, or what grounds there are for it, I cannot say. Certainly the comfort of the voyage depends very much upon the steamer, and as the steamers on the route are changed often it would be well, just before making the voyage, to consult some one in Hakodate or Sapporo as to which steamer to choose. No general advice do I know, unless the piece given above be true, except this: "Avoid chartered steamers." We took a chartered steamer on the way back, although the agent said that the food and accommodation would not be good. But more of this in its proper place.

Leaving Yokohama at 10 a.m. on the Kumamoto Maru, a slow but steady boat, we reached Oginohama about 4 p.m. the next day and stayed there about three hours. Oginohama is only a little village, with an excellent and pretty harbour, to which cargo is brought from the surrounding country. No cargo was taken on, but rice from China and saké from the Loochoos were put off. The voyage thence to Hakodate took about 30 hours, the sea being smooth. Reaching Hakodate after midnight the boat left at 2 p.m. the same day. The cargo discharged was of a general kind, including quantities of hardware, crockery, watermelons, and squashes. Up to Hakodate the course lies mostly far out from land, so that there is little to be seen. Leaving the northern treaty port in a squall we lost the only scenery on the voyage, that within four or five hours from Hakodate. Finally we anchored at Otaru at 1 p.m. on the fifth day, having spent about 15 hours at anchor.

As to the ship, only Japanese food was furnished, but all the officers and others were most obliging and it was easy to get such a modified form of Japanese food as one can get in the hotels. Moreover we had with us bread, butter, coffee, milk, and fruit. The cabins, as in perhaps all the ships of the line, were on the upper deck and near the stern, and for the latter reason objectionable, but we were the only passengers, so the captain told us to sleep in the saloon. Perhaps one might add here to the stock of general advice:—choose one of the smaller ships, with few cabins.

From Otaru it is only an hour and a half by train to Sapporo and an American can have the pleasure of riding in cars at a good rate of speed, and of hearing the peculiar hum of the wheels on the rails. The farms and the scenery along the railroad all remind one of America, though the farmers seem to have taken up more land than they can well care for.

Being in Sapporo the question arises where to stay. The majority of visitors perhaps rent and keep a house. For those who know the place and who can make their plans with certainty beforehand this is probably the best way, though it seems to be increasingly difficult to get good houses.

Then there are the Japanese hotels, which are about the same there as elsewhere, though the rates are, perhaps, higher. The rates fixed by the hotel keepers' association and posted in the hotels are yen 1.45 a day for first class accommodation. There are the usual objections, sleeping on the floor, being awakened at an early hour by the opening of shutters occasionally noisy neighbours, primitive and most annoyingly inconvenient toilet arrangements, and food that does not exactly suit even those most accustomed to it. By taking cot beds and folding chairs, and by contriving modifications of Japanese food, as a woman, aided by the usually accommodating cook, can, some of the objections may be removed. But a holiday in a Japanese hotel is not exactly a holiday. In Sapporo there is but one hotel giving accommodation for foreigners. This hotel has but three rooms to rent. It was built for an Imperial palace and most of the upper story is reserved for the Imperial Household. The chief business is that of a restaurant, large dinners being of frequent occurrence. Of the accommodations one of the servants remarked that a foreigner who had slept in all the beds said they were all like stones, except one, and that one was, I can testify, far from comfortable. The cooking is of the usual monotonous, unsatisfying kind, and those who expect an unusual variety of vegetables and fruits in the middle of August will be disappointed. If one can go earlier he will get more fruit, and if he can stay later there will be more vegetables, and apples in abundance. Of a new boarding house opened this year I cannot speak from experience. The accommodation there this year was limited, but the food was said to be excellent and the charges low.

A stay of two weeks does not enable one to say much of the climate, but there is little question about that. It seems to be not uncommon for something to cause sleeplessness during the first week or so. For this reason as well as for others, one should not go unless he can stay a month at least. Those who have been to Sapporo always advise one to take warm clothes, but it was necessary this year, at least, to have cool ones as well. Even in the heat of the day one can walk about without much discomfort if coolly clad.

For amusement there is nothing of especial interest in the town, and, as the town is situated in a wide plain, there are no walks having good scenery. The farm of the Agricultural College near the town is a most interesting place, as is also the stock farm about three miles away. For the rest one who stays longer can doubtless find amusement enough near Sapporo and by trips on the railway.

In returning from Otaru by sea our experiences were not so pleasant as in going. In the first place we took a chartered boat, despite the warning of the agent, because it left at the time we wanted to start. The Shigaura Maru was the Patroclus of the Ocean Steamship Co. some time—probably a very long time ago. The purser and the steward belong to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, all the others belong to the ship and its owner. The purser laments that there is nothing on the ship because it does not belong to the company, and it is certainly every respect far inferior to the Kumamoto Maru. The chief trouble, however, is not in the ship but in the cargo, and the cargo is the same at this time of year in all the ships. It consists of sea products, and of these products the most malodorous and sickening is the dried fish which is sent in bags to be used as a fertilizer. The fact that the cargo is of such a kind should decide one to make the journey back by rail.

On the voyage back the ship spends about 42 hours at Hakodate, and while the loading is going on no one with a nose not yet rendered happily ignorant by long residence in Japan can stay on board. Fortunately the hatches were closed at night, but then the mosquitoes would not have allowed us to sleep had we not had a mosquito net. On the voyage, too, the hatches are closed usually, but there are whiffs from the ventilators, and if they are shifting the cargo, or repairing, the odours may pursue one to all parts of the ship except those given up to crew and the steerage passengers. The motion of the ship is perplexing enough, though with fresh air it may be endured, but from these odours who can escape unhurt?

In making the journey by sea there is another thing to be considered. July and August are foggy months in these seas, and what may happen is illustrated by this voyage. About six o'clock one morning after a rainy night the fog, or gasu as they call it, came down so that we could not see a hundred yards away. Soon after this the record of the log led the captain to believe that he was off the point which he had to round to make Oginohama. But no land was to be seen, so he stopped the ship, leaving her to be rolled by the long heavy swells till about noon. Then, the fog lifting somewhat, he steered south. The fog coming on again, the engines were slowed to half speed. Then the ship was stopped in order to sound; it probably would have taken two or three miles of line to get the depth. Then the captain seems to have suspected, what was perfectly obvious, that if he went west he must find land. So he steered south west, still at half speed, though we could see half a mile ahead. At last land came in sight; he then steered west and then veered to the south again. Finally the ship found herself steered due north and made Oginohama two hours later after drifting for six hours and steaming hither and thither for six hours. Happily, as I have said, the fog lifted after about six hours, but suppose it had not? One ship was wrecked recently because it is said the captain ran too near to the coast in a fog. To avoid such a fate the policy seems to be to steer out to sea and get lost. No use was made of the sun to get a position, and it was explained by the purser that the log was out of order. But for the possibility, amounting to a probability, of getting lost in a fog August is a good month for a voyage. There is usually a storm at the end of July, or earlier, and there is nearly always one about the beginning of September.

As to the way of making the journey then, I should say that it would not be unpleasant to go by sea if one could start by the middle of July, or after the July blow was over. Even then it seems to be as liable to be foggy as at the end of August. For the return journey one should go to Mororan by rail and then the steamer for Yokohama may be taken at Hakodate after the loading is finished. But I should advise going on to Aomori to return by rail. Certainly there is little to be gained in taking the steamer at Otaru and having to wait two whole days and nights at Hakodate when by taking train the country across Hokkaido can be seen and the start may be made two days later.

This relation of experiences, which are probably not at all exceptional, may help some contemplating the journey to make it more pleasantly than they could do had they to buy the experience.

The British steamer Maroa (Capt. C. A. Adams), while on the voyage from Hongkong to Yokohama, rescued sixty-three shipwrecked Chinamen off the China coast. Fifty-six were off one large junk, and the remaining seven off another. The steamer passed several dismasted junks which were probably caught in the last typhoon off the China coast. The rescued men will be turned over to the Chinese Consul at Yokohama.

OUR BOOKSHELF.

The Silver Christ and other Stories, by OUIDA: Unwin's Colonial Library.

THE ceaseless hurry and rush of the modern literary world has chivvied Ouida into a quiet backwater, where her existence is becoming almost unknown to latter-day readers. Hers has been a strange experience. Twenty years ago she was "all the rage:" her stories were thought so improper, her impossible aristocrats so peculiarly wicked, her women so particularly Ouidaish that all the world and his wife rushed after her books—and read them on the sly. Now she would be considered tame beside the novels of the Décadent cult, and critics find fault with her syntax and style generally. In the small volume before us, the veteran authoress deals with the elementary passions as developed under the sunny skies of Italy—save in one instance, An Altruist, and even here the hero towards the close is looking forward to taking possession of an estate near Rome. In the tale that gives the title to the book, The Silver Christ, the actors are of the peasant class, and the lust of desire is painted in lurid colours. A feeling of distaste, as much with the writer as with the characters, is engendered early in the story and deepens as it draws to its close. La Selve is in better style, the central character being cast in a loftier mould than is the generality of Ouida's creations. A Lemon Tree is very pathetic, but An Altruist is frankly impossible. Had Ouida been writing a Saturday night melodrama for a Surrey-side theatre she could not have been more absurdly theatrical and unreal. Her knowledge of the mental processes of the lower classes of England of the present day is lamentably deficient. Possibly when Dickens was a lad, language such as she puts into Mrs. Brown's, Annie's, and Sam's mouths may have been in vogue, but to-day, no. Toxin, the concluding story, is equally as unpleasant as The Silver Christ, but from another cause. A physician, taking advantage of his position and his scientific knowledge, deliberately does to death a trusting friend in order that he may marry the women whom his friend loves, and who passionately loves his friend. Altogether one puts down the book with a sigh that such stories should be considered worth publishing.

A Voyage of Consolation, by SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN: Methuen's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

ONE is certain of a good half-hour's enjoyment when a book by Miss Sara Jeannette Duncan (Mrs. Everard Cotes) issues from the Press. Whether dealing with the adventures of two chaperoneless globe-trotting girls, or relating the mishaps that befal a saintly maiden aunt in India, Miss Duncan's pen distils pure fun. And yet it is a fun that one likes to assimilate in homœopathic doses—in monthly parts, rather than in volume form. When we get it in one solid lump it rather palls. Yet we can honestly say that in A Voyage of Consolation, laughter accompanies one a long way on the journey from cover to cover, and towards the end the jokes freshen up again in a most encouraging fashion. Miss Mamie Wick, only child of Senator Wick of Chicago, quarrels with her fiancée, Mr. Arthur Greenleaf Page, of Yale,—the young American taking offence at the manner in which she pronounces the English language; Miss Mamie having picked up the "English accent" during her visit to Europe the preceding summer—and the engagement is summarily snapped. As soon as the young man has left the Chicago house Miss Mamie rings up her "poppa" by telephone—he is in bed in a New York hotel by-the-bye—and as a result of a short colloquy over the wires the Senator proposes that the family should go abroad for a few weeks—"the usual thing in such cases," as the Senator remarks. He gives Mamie and her "momma" twenty-four hours or so to meet him on the Germanic, and of course the connection is made. The book then relates in detail a six weeks' rush through Europe, and readers of Miss Duncan's former works can easily judge of the manner of conversation, observation, and general delineation of character that fills the pages of Miss Mamie's lively "note book." All ends happily, of course. The book is just the thing for holiday reading.

The Golfing Pilgrim, by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON: London, Methuen's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Kelly and Walsh, Limited.

SAID the irascible Colonel to the American stranger who had lounged out on the links and passed a remark that made the Colonel foozle his put: "Probably, as a foreigner, you know nothing whatever of the game of Golf."

"No, sir," returned the American, unabashed. "It is a form of lunacy from which I have not yet suffered. I have had chicken-pox, I have had measles, I have even had philanthropy; but, thank goodness, I have never yet had Golf."

"Then let me tell you, sir, yet again, that the time will come when every man of an English-speaking nation (and I include the American nation) will suffer from what you are pleased to call this form of lunacy."

And yet it is not necessary to know anything, even the most rudimentary principles of the royal and ancient game, to appreciate the collection of articles on golf—hitherto scattered about in the pages of Golf, Golfing Annual, Harper, Blackwood, Murray, Macmillan and Cornhill, —that Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson has collected and published in book form under the title of The Golfing Pilgrim. Mr. Hutchinson is an enthusiast, but he wields a graceful pen—a pen that is the instrument for conveying many a genial witticism, many a large-hearted syllogism upon golf, humanity, and the world in general, and his work will therefore be found a worthy solace for those hours in an exile's life when heavier literature palls and becomes a weariness to the flesh as well as to the mind.

In the course of the Pilgrimage under review we visit in fancy most of the famous Golf links of Scotland, England, France, and the Channel Islands, learning the characteristics of the various places and the trials, tribulations, and also the triumphs and the joys, that attend the golfer at one and all. Of course St Andrew's, the very cradle of the game, finds abundant space in the book; but so also do the links to be found in the Southern counties of England. At Guernsey, the Pilgrim will find "girl-caddies." And this is what Mr. Hutchinson has to say of them:—"It is a discovery, on the part of the Guernsey golfer, that the girl-caddie gives more attention to your needs, more sympathy to your misfortunes, than that most savage of all wild animals, as Plato calls him, the boy." Apropos of the caddie, the book has some good stories anent this strange species of the genus homo. As Mr. Hutchinson remarks, "The golf caddie has probably unequalled opportunities as a student of human nature." A golfer once enquired what manner of looking man a certain Mr. So-and-so was, knowing the gentlemen only by name. "Eh, weel, he's jest a bull-neckit, hog-backit, bandy-ligged chiel, and shapes fine for a gowfer." For terseness and vigour this answer would be hard to beat. A caddie once testified to his master's merits in these terms:—"He's a fine free-spoken gentleman; but, whiles, blasphemious." Another lad was once remonstrated with upon his habit of swearing. He replied:—"Sweerin', ou aye, it's awful wucked; but it's a grand set off to the conversation."

Golf, the author observes, has spread to every spot where the English-speaking race is to be found. The statement is rather sweeping. But even in the Far East one can find links at Singapore, Hongkong, Amoy, Shanghai and, we believe, at Tientsin. Japan at present is without a links, but we have no doubt an enthusiast will come amongst us one day and discover a place where it will be quite possible to pursue the game after a fashion. Until that happy day arrives we must content our souls in patience and remain envious of the folks who can follow the advice and obtain the delightful experiences so admirably set out in The Golfing Pilgrim.

The Crook of the Bough, by MÉNIE MURIEL DOWIE; London, Methuen's Colonial Library: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

ABOUT the time of Her Majesty's first Jubilee Miss Ménie Muriel Dowie (now Mrs. Henry Norman) published a book of travels that for artlessness of style, descriptive vividness, and charm of language placed her easily first among the band of women writers who were then beginning to attract attention in the literary world of London. The success of A Girl in the Carpathians was so instant and wide-reaching that the young authoress's head was slightly "turned." At any rate her next plunge into the literary vortex was marked by the production of as strange a farrago of giddy emotionalism as the most erotic of the decadent school could have aspired to place in the hands of the printers. And in her present venture, The Crook of the Bough, Ménie Muriel Dowie does not exactly shine. The story lacks balance and is full of mannerisms that jar as disagreeably upon the eye as they do upon the ear.

Islay Netherdale has been brought up as a "man's girl." That is, she makes an excellent private secretary for her brother George, who has just entered Parliament: using the typewriter with the practised ease of a trained hand. She makes speeches for him at times; at times, sketches out others for him; and of course dresses — plainly as the most austere Girton blue-stocking could wish. She is, by training, an entire stranger to the impulses of love, and the ordinary amenities of her sex are as nothing to her: she doesn't know what they are, to begin with. George decides to visit South eastern Europe, Constantinople being his objective, and takes his sister-secretary-confidante with him. Here they meet a Colonel Hassan Achmet Bey, and Islay falls in love with him (quite unconsciously) and he with her. He loves her because she is a type of woman utterly unknown to him—a strong comrade, a firm friend, a woman who has discarded fine dresses and feminine fripperies and frowned upon the soft delights of laces and flounces and scents and sweetmeats such as the women he knows love. Well, the brother and sister return to London and Hassan Bey follows them to make his declaration of love. To his surprise another Islay greets him—a creature attired in the latest fashions of Peter Robinson's, a woman who has thrown over the use of the typewriter, abandoned private-secretarial work and becomes an ordinary well-dressed, well-educated, well-informed member of the upper middle class. The poor Colonel is so surprised that though he makes a flattering admission of his love for the former Islay, he renounces his dream and returns to the East. Islay meanwhile is left to ponder upon her failure—her total failure!

That is the story, and doubtless many will read it for its writer's sake and not feel too disappointed when they reach the end.

HAWAII.

The following is an extract from a private letter from Honolulu:—While the papers give a glowing account of the flag raising and paint it bright, it was a sad and impressive ceremony to see even so small a nation as this, recognized as such by the Powers, lose in the space of 15 minutes its identity and be swallowed up by a Power as great as the United States. Regardless of pressure brought to bear to keep the natives away from the scene, many were there; and, as reveillé was sounded, the [Hawaiian] flag was slowly hauled down, and the band for the last time played the National Anthem ("Hawaii Ponoi") the poor natives, old men and women, as well as the present generation, could not hold back their tears. Nor were they the only ones who were affected. Americans and others of the Anglo-Saxon race, who had lived and prospered under the Hawaiian flag, were forced to raise their handkerchiefs to their eyes.

RUSSIA IN MANCHURIA.

The Mukden correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News writes, under date of August 15th:—

There are numerous rumours as to the presence and doings of Russians in many parts of the province. A few years ago both Manchu and Chinese officers spoke in terms of warm commendation of the treatment received by them and their people generally at the hands of Russians, on the borders north and east of Manchuria. I regret to hear stories of a very different sort now. These are too persistent and from too many places to be entirely baseless. We do not know whether Russia intends or not to take formal possession of these rich provinces. If she does and if a feeble voice can reach their men of authority let me urge them to exercise a little more care over the more ignorant of their followers. Nothing rouses the enmity of Chinese more readily than the appearance of familiarity towards their women. Respectable Chinese women, however poor, should, when met, be passed as though unseen. Another easy way of rousing antipathy is by taking things, possibly of little value, without giving the market price therefor. The Japanese in both respects gained golden opinions in Southern Manchuria. Yet it is not very creditable to Europe when one hears the wish generally expressed that Japan and not Russia should rule over the people. It pays well in the long run to give the market price for everything utilised. The last story current here is one for which there should be no foundation. It is that the Russians in laying out the road for the coming railway cut down the growing grain standing on the future roadway, giving no compensation, and made the farmers cut down the tall millet which was more difficult to cut than the shorter grains. If this has been done a fair compensation given in time will be well spent money in the way of preparing for future action. Some time ago any foreign nation would be welcomed by the people. Their feelings are anything but unanimous on that matter now. The Chinaman has no particular interest in the nationality of his rulers and tax gatherers; but he has a keen sense of justice where his own personal interests are concerned.

The Japanese Consulate at Foochow was opened on the 10th August, Mr. Acting Consul Suyematsu Teshima assuming charge. Early on the morning of the 1st, a thief entered the house of Mr. Fukai, an official of the Accountants Inspection Board, living at Kagocho, Sugamo, Tokyo. His nephew gave the alarm, and Mr. Fukai's wife, named Miyo, screamed for help. A jinrikisha coolie named Kintaro (23) answered the call, and, seeing the mistress, took her to be the thief and stabbed her in the heart. He was arrested.

The Yomiuri reports a fracas between Italian officers and jinrikisha men. Six officers of the Marco Polo, on the 4th, went to the Yokohama Railway Station to catch the 8 45 a.m. train for Tokyo. They took jinrikisha from the English Hatoba, and on arriving at the station one of the officers gave a nickel to his coolie, who, of course demanded another five sen. The officer was greatly enraged by the request, and with a sword-stick he was carrying beat the coolie so violently that the sheath of the stock was broken and the sword is alleged to have wounded the man on the hand. A general disturbance ensued, and continued until the arrival of the police.

AUSTRALIA AND JAPAN.

Sydney, August 6th.

The rumour of an intended Japanese settlement on an extended scale in the northern territory of Australia, occasioned considerable disquietude throughout the colonies, there being already a considerable Chinese and Malay population, largely outnumbering the whites, and practically having their own laws, manners, and customs. On the arrival of Mr. J. L. Parsons, the Japanese consul at Adelaide, in Sydney, he was at once interviewed with respect to his reported action in the matter. He declared that the whole trouble had arisen from a misconceived notion of the intentions of some private freeholders. There was no foundation for the statement that he had endeavoured to obtain offers from Japanese capitalists for any concessions of Crown lands anywhere in the Northern Territory, nor was there any truth in the report that he had sought to arrange for the settlement of any Japanese in the Northern Territory. The fact was that the owners of certain freehold lands in the Northern Territory had authorised him to place the lands which they had purchased from the Crown under offer in Japan or elsewhere. None of those lands were on the Victoria River, and they had been purchased from the South Australian Government on the distinct understanding that coloured labour could be introduced into the Northern Territory. This, he said, was shown by the fact that the provisional annexation of the Northern Territory by South Australia was obtained by the statement of Sir Dominick Daly, then Governor of South Australia, that the Northern Territory being tropical, and near to the populous nations of Asia, the labour difficulty could be easily overcome. The South Australian Government also first introduced Chinese, and it passed the act for the introduction of coolie labour. The lands placed in his hands were purchased after this legislation was agreed to, but as the South Australian Government had neglected or refused to appoint a coolie immigration agent-general for the Northern Territory the owners of land had been unable to utilise it for want of suitable labour, or owing to the threatened exclusion of such labour had been unable to dispose of it. He was not able at present to make anything public in regard to the result of his negotiations until he had reported to his principals, but they did not seem to reach the stage which points to early occupation of Northern Territory lands by any large number of Japanese. Mr. Parsons further remarked that in the face of the hostility of the South Australian Government, he would never have gone on the wild goose chase of approaching the Japanese Government to induce it to send Japanese to settle on Crown lands on the Victoria River. In addition, he never heard from the Japanese officials of any proposal to give a portion of the Northern Territory for purposes of Japanese settlement.

Recent circumstances in connection with British New Guinea have made the colonists extremely suspicious, and they are not quite satisfied with the explanations given by Mr. Parsons. They would rather have Japanese settlers than any other class of Asiatics, but as a young community, not overlarge in numbers, they naturally wish to exclude the elements of possible international difficulties. It is tolerably certain that whatever may be the ulterior views of Mr. Parsons, he will not be allowed to do as he pleases in the matter of settlement in the Northern Territory.

The immigration of Japanese women for immoral purposes is beginning to attract attention in Northern Queensland, the Northern Territory, and Western Australia. They are said to flit through Hongkong and Port Darwin. The increase is most marked at Thursday Island, and cases are reported where the women were bought and sold like sheep or cattle. No one blames the Japanese authorities for this state of things, the respective colonial governments being mainly responsible. Should Australian federation become an accomplished fact, one of the first matters to be dealt with by the federal parliament will be the traffic in Asiatic women for immoral purposes. In some places the hospital authorities are appalled at the terribly diseased condition of the Japanese women brought to them for treatment, generally too late for efficient medical assistance. The principals in the unholy trade are mostly Japanese, the others being Chinese, and of the two the former are by far the worst. In the southern cities of Australia there are numerous Japanese lady residents, and their high moral character and unimpeachable behaviour simply intensifies the public horror at the miserable fate of their degraded sisters in the far north.

It is on Thursday Island that the progress of Japanese settlement in Australia has become most marked, and the Queenslander, alluding to the recently published report of the Government Resident at that place, says,—"Mr. Douglas in the report before us records an increase of population at 1st March last as compared with the same date in 1897, of 358; the figures being 1,344 and 1,702. But when we look into it we find that this means almost exclusively an increase of Japanese. Europeans have increased from 571 to 608, a difference of 37 only. Excepting the Japanese, other nationalities have increased from 442 to 475, a difference of 33. The Japanese have increased from 331 to 619, a difference of 288. They have in fact nearly doubled; they are now more numerous than the whites; and they are considerably over a third of the entire population. The figures of course are small compared with the white population of Queensland, and insignificant compared with that of all Australia. The cry of the Japanese overrunning Australia, or even Queensland, and competing with us in every trade, is absurd enough. Supposing them to come in the future as in the year just past, and omitting births and deaths here (they do not as a rule bring their women), it would take them 1,600 years to equal our present Queensland population. What we are dealing with is the comparatively small question of a settlement at Thursday Island. Still we do not like the idea of even a Thursday Island Japanese settlement. We do not want white men ousted—if they are ousted—by men of colour in any corner of Australia. We do not want to see an industry monopolised by them. That this should be done anywhere, or in regard to any industry, were the admission of an evil principle which might soon be applied on a larger scale. Nor do we find much comfort in the remark of Mr. Douglas that "very few Japanese are coming from Japan; they are filtering in from Hongkong and Port Darwin." That may make it easier, as he says, to find a remedy; but in itself it matters nothing where they come from." Mr. Douglas, however, points out that the Japanese at Thursday Island do not interfere with white labour, but simply undertake duties which, otherwise, would not be performed. He says:—"However desirable it might be to have an exclusively European population, as some people think, it seems to be admitted on all hands that the pearl shell industry as at present worked could scarcely exist without the assistance of an alien population. It is conceivable, of course, that, if we had a redundant population who were willing to work in the boats, as South Sea Islanders or Asiatics do, at wages ranging from £2 to £3 10s. a month—the latter price being the rate of tenders' wages—the industry might be carried on profitably at those rates by our own people. The occupation is a healthy one, and not exposed to anything like the same risk as that incurred by many seafaring people in older countries. If, in addition to this, men could be found who would be content with a somewhat abstemious diet and the use of liquor, those who are engaged in the industry by the investment of capital would undoubtedly prefer to give employment to their own countrymen on such terms; but the men are not forthcoming. It follows that they employ what men they can get, and if the industry is to be kept alive we must employ aliens. South Sea Islanders were first employed, then Malays, then Manila men, and now Japanese. The latter have increased considerably in numbers, and have begun to command such a large share of influence in the industry that their toleration has acquired a political significance, and has attracted the attention of our legislators. My somewhat prolonged experience in these latitudes leads me to the conclusion that we may, without prejudice to our future prospects as a people, avail ourselves of such assistance as we can obtain from an alien population in order to develop our nascent industries provided we take care to build up our own native-born population in such a way as to constitute it the dominant factor in our Constitution. The distinction of colour or creed should not exist for us, so long as we secure the rightful ascendency of our race. The present population of Thursday Island is an illustration, I hold, of what may be done to plant a thriving civilisation permanently on our shores, under circumstances which would not admit of an exclusively European type. * * * I should be very sorry to see Japanese immigration encouraged, because I think that if allowed to come in too great numbers they would be harmful, but I think that on a limited scale they may be made useful. The Government of Japan is quite willing that the emigration should be controlled. The Government of Queensland can thus place any limitation they please on it." J.P.

CZAR'S PEACE PROPOSAL.

FRANCO-RUSSIAN ALLIANCE IN DANGER.

London, Sept. 1.

The French papers accuse the Czar of ignoring the continuous and strenuous preparations of France to recover the lost Provinces (Alsace Lorraine). It is beginning to be felt that the Czar's manifesto is a grave blow to the Franco-Russian Alliance. President Faure and his Ministers are hastily returning to Paris to deliberate upon the manifesto. The enthusiasm of the German official papers regarding the proposal of reducing armaments has further exasperated France.

THE KWANGSI REBELLION.

Hongkong, August 30.

The Viceroy of the Two Kwang prohibits the Canton papers publishing any news of the Kwangsi rebellion unless it is favourable to the Imperialists.

Alarmist reports, probably exaggerated, are in circulation; the rebels are said to be within two days' march of Canton. The Black Flags are encamped at the North Gate for the protection of the City.

The rebel chief Chang has issued a violent anti-foreign proclamation, stating that the object of the rebellion is to drive out the foreigners who devour the wealth of the people and to protect the Chinese.

The standard of rebellion was raised on the 24th day of the 6th moon, the 11th of August.

It is reported that the Viceroy Tan Chung-lin resigns on account of the concession to the French at Kwangchouwan.

THE SITUATION IN MANILA.

Manila, August 26.

The town of Manila is gradually assuming a peaceful aspect. Public affairs are being conducted smoothly and efficiently in all the departments under the military governorship of Major-General Merritt.

Stores are being thrown open, merchant hongs opened up, and books and goods brought from their places of safety, and, generally speaking, local business is being actively resumed throughout Tondo and Binondo.

The waterworks are now in good working order.

Thanks to the energetic efforts of the American officials, the obstructions at the mouth of the river Pasig have at last been removed, and the river is open once more to steamboats and other craft.

Stringent measures have been taken to ensure the sanitation of the city and the protection of public health. The citadel—the walled city—crowded as it is with prisoners, is in an abominably filthy state, and the condition of the Spanish barracks is such as to constitute a positive menace to the general health.

Notwithstanding their recent experiences, the health of the American troops continues excellent. From the date of landing down to the present time, only seventeen deaths have occurred among the troops from disease, and the majority of these were due to diseases contracted on board the transports.

The Spanish authorities have now surrendered to General Merritt's executive 23,000 stands of arms, 10,000,000 cartridges, and an immense quantity of large ammunition. There are nearly 14,000 prisoners.

A day or two ago, the insurgents despatched an armed steamer, with 500 soldiers on board, for an unknown destination. Consequently, the local coasting steamers, manned by Spanish sailors, are afraid to venture out of the Bay until they are assured of the protection of the American fleet.

It is impossible to obtain information regarding the interior of Luzon, except along the railway where everything is quiet. Rumours are current here, and credence is given to them, that the rebels are carrying on an active campaign in the southern end of the island.

Six hundred priests, including 120 prisoners among the insurgents, will depart for Hongkong under the care of the Belgian Consul whenever a transport is procured.

In regard to the political situation, there is undoubtedly practical unanimity amongst the merchants and traders here, regardless of nationality, in favour of the permanent occupation of the Philippine Archipelago by the United States. Nobody conceives the re-establishment of Spanish supremacy possible. As yet, we are in the dark as to the intentions of the United States Government. Private advices only have been received concerning the final arrangements for the negotiation of peace.

THE SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Manila, August 28.

Since I wired you this morning important political changes have developed. President Aguinaldo proposes to move his headquarters immediately from Bacoor to Malolos, a large town in the Province of Bulacan, on the railway line and about twenty miles north of Manila.

He intends to assemble a congress there shortly, composed of the leading Filippinos favouring the insurgent cause. He also intends to send a Filippino representative to Paris, to attend, if possible, the deliberations of the Peace Commission and argue the claims of the insurgents for the establishment of a native Republic.

Malolos has an excellent strategic position. It covers the principal rice and tobacco-growing districts, besides the route to Blacnabato, where the Spaniards were obliged to make the treaty when they purchased the cessation of hostilities last year.

This movement on the part of President Aguinaldo is probably in a measure due to the fact that he is fast losing his influence in the Province of Cavite, where the insurgents in arms confidently expected to be permitted to occupy the town of Manila conjointly with the Americans.

Considerable dissatisfaction is apparent among the insurgent troops, and a frank expression of opinion is frequently heard that Aguinaldo is selling the native cause a second time.

AN AMERICAN KILLED BY THE INSURGENTS.

Hongkong, Aug. 29.

On Wednesday, the 24th inst., a collision occurred between some Americans and insurgents at Cavite, originating in a row in a shop. An American fired his revolver but did not hit any one; the insurgents replied with their rifles, and killed one American. A detachment was sent from the camp, and there were a few wounded on each side.

The insurgents have been required to move to a distance of two miles from Cavite. The situation is quiet but strained. The insurgents say they must maintain their readiness to resist the Spaniards if the islands are returned to them; otherwise they are willing to acquiesce in the American plans.

THE COLOGNE TOURNAMENT.

The Eleventh International Tournament of the German Schachbund began on August 1st, in Cologne, Germany. The absence of Tarrasch and Pillsbury seems to have detracted somewhat from the interest, but the Chess world was well represented. Of those who played at Vienna there were Steinitz, Showalter, Janowski, Tschigorin, Burn, Schlechter, and Schiffers. The others were Charousek, of Budapesth; Cohn, of Berlin; Popiel, of Lemberg; Gottschall, of Posen; Heinrichsen, of Cologne; Fritz, of Darmstadt; Schallopp, of Berlin; Albin, of Vienna; Berger, of Gratz. This was a one-round tournament, six days a week, fifteen moves an hour. The eight prizes aggregated $850. At the time of going to press we have received the result of the sixth round, with the following total score:—

NOTES.

(a) B to Q Kt 5 is better, and at least threatens a good deal. The text move enables Black to exchange a valuable piece and obtain freedom at once.

(b) It is evident later that this move of the Q is particularly good. It is immediately threatening, and the piece cannot be driven away.

(c) White is bound to develop, but this costs a pawn, as will appear.

(d) All the play here is very clever, and by this means Black keeps his pieces to the front instead of retreating, which would be the obvious course. It is merely an exchange, but a good one.

(e) This move threatens if R takes B, B takes P ch, and Black would more than regain the piece.

(f) The capture of the pawn was fatal (at move 37), but there was little else to do. White must either lose the piece or be subjected to a killing attack. This is a finely played game.

GAME No. 429.

An interesting game played by Steinitz at the Vienna Chess Club:—

NOTES.

(a) B to K 3 of far greater defensive value.

(b) Kt to K 3 seems better, for if White then plays 20—Kt to Q 5, B takes Kt would follow.

(c) White's move was a very strong one, and there does not seem any better move at Black's disposal than this, although it has the drawback of exposing the king. Perhaps B to K 4 at once might have been played.

(d) Black hardly realised the fact that he was in danger, as otherwise he would have played Kt to Q 3 for defensive purposes.

(e) White follows up his advantage in a powerful manner. He threatens now Kt takes P ch, winning the queen.

(f) Gnethe would say such moves are always available, but you must know where to find them. The move leads to a forced win.

(g) Trying to avoid R to Q2 as long as he can.

(h) If K to Q 2, 29—Q to Kt 7 ch, K to K 3; 30—Q to B 7 mates.

NOTES.

The Literary Digest calls attention to several very interesting facts revealed in the final score of the Vienna Tournament: First, Dr. Tarrasch has made two new records in the history of Chess: (1) of the 37 games he played he lost only two; and (2) he played 20 games (from the 14th to the 34th) without being defeated. Second, while Pillsbury lost three more games than Tarrasch, he won three more. Third, Blackburn beats Schlechter as a drawing-master, for he had 20 games that gave him ½ a point. Fourth, Schlechter lost only six games.

As an evidence of the progress made in Chess in the last thirty-five or forty years, Reichelm, in The Times, Philadelphia, calls attention to the fact that Morphy in 1859-1860 could have given the odds of a Knight to any player in America except Paulsen and H. P. Montgomery; and declares that "now the United States has, at least, fifty players too strong for that odds, even for a Morphy. Philadelphia and New York could furnish ten each."

The demand has been gradually decreasing the last week or two, and prices are generally lower by one yen. Common and good medium grades secure most demand. There are 13,000 piculs in stock, and the amount still to come in from the country must be very large. The total settlements to date are 173,364 piculs, against 188,245 at the corresponding date last year.

IT is alleged that the reason why H E Li Hung-chang was released from the post of President of the Tsung-li Yamên is that Great Britain declined to open negotiations with the Yamên in presence of Li, by whom diplomatic secrets have always been divulged to the Russian Minister.

NEWS has reached Omdurman that a white force, believed to the French, is occupying Fashoda. Sir Herbert Kitchener is proceeding thither. The English newspapers comment seriously on this news, and all recall the declaration, made in the House of Commons by Sir E. Grey in 1895, that French interference on the Upper Nile would be regarded as an unfriendly act. Meanwhile the French press is jubilant at the presence of Frenchmen at Fashoda.

BUSINESS is still very slow in the import trade, though signs of an improvement are evident. Few transactions are reported in textiles, but the metal market shows a tendency to renewed activity, and the approach of winter is making the demand for kerosene more brisk. As regards exports the demand for raw silk appears to have fallen off, both for Europe and the States, and business is accordingly slack. The waste silk market is practically a blank. In sugar the usual steady trade is being done at prices practically at last week's level. The purchases of tea have fallen off, and in view of a large stock—nearly 1,000,000 catties show a tendency to decline.

THE DEATH OF THE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

The assassination of the Empress of AUSTRIA by an Italian Anarchist is the most shocking event that has occurred in Europe since the cruel murder of the Emperor of RUSSIA seventeen years ago. Her Majesty was in her sixty-first year. If anything were needed to add to the horror of the event, it is supplied by the age of the victim. No long time has passed since Europe had to mourn for a calamity which plunged the House of Hapsburg into the profoundest grief, and now this appalling catastrophe supervenes to fill the cup of sorrow. The ways of fate are always inscrutable, but certainly her mood seems more than commonly malignant when she deals such crushing blows to a SOVEREIGN who, during a long reign of fifty years, has constantly established new claims upon the respect of the world and the affection of his subjects. The pure wantonness of the crime makes it the more execrable and the more inexplicable. Even the most disordered imagination could not associate the Empress ELIZABETH with politics however remotely. What then are we to say of her assassination? Was it simply a blind and brutal display of the insanity which the fierce struggle for life is producing in modern Europe? Apparently that is the explanation. Philosophers may demonstrate the necessity of social inequality, but such subtle propositions are hard of discernment to brains numbed by toil and suffering, and so long as an immense interval separates the extremes of the scale of living, weak minds will be rendered dizzy by its contemplation. The mania called anarchy is that and only that. When the intelligence of such a barbarity is made public, men's first impulse is to wish that vengeance in some equally striking form should be wreaked on the assassin. But these mad protests against the existing order of things would only be encouraged by any straining of the criminal law to punish them. There have been five attempts, or seeming attempts, on the life of Queen VICTORIA, and in no instance was the death penalty inflicted. It is well said that the best protection sovereigns can have is not to exaggerate the danger to which they are exposed. The Emperor of AUSTRIA is too wise to lose sight of these considerations even in the moment of his supreme sorrow, which every nation of the civilized world sincerely shares.

THE "ASAHI."

The Morning Sun—not as euphonious a name as the Japanese Asahi, of which it is the translation—is to be a first-class line-of-battle ship of 15,443 tons—the monarch of the Japanese Navy—and 18 knots speed. She is being built at Lord Armstrong & Co.'s and Japanese journals say that she is progressing much more rapidly than her sistership, the Shikishima, which is being constructed at the Thames Iron Works, we believe. The crew for bringing out the big ship will be named at the end of November, and it is said that she will reach Japan in December, 1899.

THE TREATIES AND THE TARIFF.

The long period of doubt and uncertainty as to the date when the new Tariff would be put into operation is now at an end. The Official Gazette of the 10th instant contains Notifications to the effect that both the Statutory Tariff and the Conventional Tariff will go into effect from the 1st of January next. About two months ago, we referred to a special arrangement which the Austro-Hungarian Government had intimated its intention of making in order that the delay in exchanging the ratifications of the Revised Treaty with Japan might not have the effect of postponing the advantages accruing to the latter under its revised treaties with the other Western Powers. The Revised Treaty with Austria-Hungary was concluded on December 5th, 1897. Its discussion had occupied a very long time, owing to the persistent desire of the Government in Vienna that the Treaty should be accompanied by a special tariff, a concession which Japan was not disposed to make in view of the very insignificant dimensions of the trade between this country and Austria-Hungary. Finally, however, the wishes of the Vienna Foreign Office were complied with, and the Treaty, with the appended Tariff, having received the signatures of the High Contracting Parties, ratification remained the only necessary formality. But unfortunately, the domestic troubles in Austria-Hungary presented an obstacle to the smooth progress of events, and presently it became obvious that the consent of the parliaments in Vienna and Buda-Pest could not be obtained in time to allow the Japanese Government to issue a year's notice preliminary to the operation of the Treaties. July 27th, 1899, was the date fixed for the enforcement of the Treaties, provided that a year's previous notice were given by Japan. Consequently, unless the Austro-Hungarian Treaty was ratified, and unless the ratifications were exchanged, before July 17th, 1898, Japan would not be in a position to issue the required notice. It may appear at first sight that since July 17th, 1899, was, not the definitely fixed, but only the earliest date for giving effect to the Treaties, a simple solution of the difficulty caused by Austria-Hungary's delay would have been to postpone the issue of Japan's preliminary notice. But in the case of three of the Revised Treaties no latitude of that kind was provided: the 17th of July, 1899, had been fixed unconditionally as the date on which these particular Treaties should take effect. Hence if the Japanese Government had wished to make any postponement, a new arrangement must have been negotiated with the three Powers. It was to avert all such complications that the Emperor of Austria-Hungary consented to exercise his sovereign prerogative by giving binding force to the Treaty without Parliamentary ratification, and thus the Japanese Government was able to issue the necessary notice to the various Powers last July. As to the new Tariff, it might have been enforced from the close of last month, the periods of delay conceded to the various Powers having expired at that time. But the Austro-Hungarian Government stipulated that, in view of the special concession made by it, the operation of the Tariff should be postponed until January 1st, 1899, in order that Austro-Hungarian subjects might have due notice. The 1st of next January thus became the earliest date for enforcing the Tariff. A belief prevailed, however, that Japan's preparations would not be completed by that time, and that the date ultimately chosen would be April 1st, 1899, the beginning of the 32nd fiscal year of Meiji. But the Notifications issued on the 10th instant dispose of that idea. The Tariffs, statutory and conventional, are to go into force from January 1st. It is scarcely necessary to explain, perhaps, that by "statutory tariff" we mean the general tariff enacted by the Japanese Diet in 1897; and by "conventional tariff," the tariff negotiated with the Treaty Powers. The statutory tariff is applicable to commerce conducted by subjects or citizens of non-treaty States, and to any articles of treaty State commerce that are not covered by the conventional tariff. Copies of the conventional tariffs hitherto negotiated have already been published. The following is the text of the supplementary tariff appended to the Austro-Hungarian Treaty:—

We may add that a Notification has also been issued to the effect that although the ratifications of the Revised Treaty with Austria-Hungary have not been exchanged, a special arrangement between the High Contracting Parties enables the Treaty to be put into operation from July 7th, 1899—that is to say, the Treaty itself, not the Tariff referred to above. Our readers will probably find the subject somewhat confusing, but it becomes perfectly intelligible if two points are kept clearly in mind—first, that the date for the operation of the Tariff is quite independent of the date for the operation of the Treaties; secondly, that whereas some final arrangement with regard to the Treaty itself had to be come to with the Government in Vienna before July 17th, 1898, no necessity of the kind existed with regard to the Tariff. It is only fair to say that the action of the Austro-Hungarian Government in the final stages of this affair was friendly and considerate, but we can not persuade ourselves to think that an import trade of eighty-six thousand yen justified the Vienna Government in insisting on a special tariff in the first instance, and thus creating a lengthy delay with all its subsequent complications. It is true that Austria's import trade with Japan grew from twenty-four thousand yen in 1893 to eighty-six thousand in 1897, but if we examine the returns for the latter year, we find that among the articles on account of which special rates have now been solemnly fixed by convention between the two empires, lamps and their parts are represented by 2,082 yen, furniture by 1,553 yen, buttons by 2,105 yen and glass ware by 10,698 yen. Insect powder is not honoured with an independent heading by the Customs Authorities.

TAXATION MEASURES.

We gather from vernacular journals that a tendency to regard an increase of the Land Tax as inevitable shows signs of growing in official circles. Among the prominent advocates of the measure are now said to be counted Count Itagaki and Messrs. Hoshi, Hayashi, Matsuda, Taguchi, Kataoka, Haseba, Shimada, and Kashiwada. The fact is that the sake tax does not present such a wide margin for exploitation as some politicians seem to imagine. There are already signs of a large increase in the import of Chinese samshu, which, to vulgar palates, makes an excellent substitute for sake and has the advantage of being more intoxicating. There can be no manner of doubt that if the tax on sake be raised from 7 yen per koku to 12 yen, and if domestic brewing be interdicted as well as the brewing of unrefined sake, severe regulations being also enacted for controlling the manufacture of mixed sake—which is the programme of those that advocate recourse to the sake tax alone for meeting the deficiency in the revenue—, Chinese samshu will be poured into the country in large quantities, unless the import duty is heavily augmented. In short, the tariff will have to be radically altered in the matter of both alcohol and samshu if any considerable change is to be made in the sake tax.

Another point is that people may possibly take to drinking mulled claret instead of sake. The lower orders would doubtless be content with mixed sake, if they could get it, for it can be made from alcohol at a comparatively low price, and they would also be content with Chinese samshu, but we do not see why the upper classes should not gradually substitute mulled claret for refined sake, if the latter be heavily taxed. Mr. Sone, the former Minister of Justice, recently referred to this point. A barrel (taru) of sake contains a little more than 3 to, and consequently 3 barrels go to the koku. Now the cost of a barrel of Nada sake is about 19 yen in Tokyo, and if the tax be 12 yen a koku, the barrel must be sold for 23 yen, or 21 yen at the very lowest; say, 50 francs. But a barrel of claret, running 280 bottles, can be bought in France for 60 or 70 francs, and if duty and freight, &c., be added, we may safely say that a very fair claret can be laid down here for 100 francs a barrel, or 15 sen a bottle, which is very much less than refined sake would cost were the duty raised to 12 yen per koku.

Meanwhile the tobacco monopoly is proving a signal failure. We have so often written about this question that we hesitate to speak of it again. In truth it was a matter of very simple arithmetic to show that unless the duty on imported tobacco could be raised to 150 or 200 per cent., the prices that the Government intended to charge for the home grown leaf under the monopoly—the prices that it would ultimately be necessary to charge if the expensive, clumsy system of a monopoly were adhered to—could not possibly be obtained, since Chinese and other foreign tobacco would drive the domestic article out of the market. That is what is happening now. The tobacco imported during the first half of the current year aggregated 13 million yen, and the leaf offered by the official monopolists is simply out of the competition. Thus the country has been committed to a heavy capital outlay, and instead of the revenue's being augmented by eight million yen, it is doubtful whether an actual loss will not be incurred. There is time still to turn to the simple and thoroughly practical English system of passing all the tobacco through the Government storehouses and levying a fixed sum on it in transit. Under the monopoly a charge of at least 25 sen per lb. must be made in order to cover the heavy expenses incurred and leave a substantial profit, whereas under the English system a charge of 12 sen per pound should yield a revenue of from 9 to 10 million yen.

A POLICE MISTAKE.

Mr. Carl Ginter, a German resident of Yokohama, tells the following story on Saturday afternoon. He was peacefully watching the cricket match when a detective tapped him on the shoulder, and told him he was "wanted" by the police. Mr. Ginter, asked for an explanation and demanded to see the warrant for his arrest. This request, however, was declined, and the constable who accompanied the detective proceeded to take him into custody and to march him, protesting vigorously, in the direction of the Police Station. Mr. Ginter asked to be allowed to go to Messrs. Raspe & Co.'s, where he said he would be at once identified, and the mistake found out. This was refused, and, despite all his protests, Mr. Ginter was hurried along by the constables, who, it is alleged, used a quite unnecessary amount of force. They were followed by some coolies, who acted as a sort of bodyguard. According to Mr. Ginter's story one of the policemen who was holding him gripped him in a way that caused considerable pain and he, by a vigorous twist, freed himself from his captors. Thereupon a shout was raised, and the policemen and coolies rushed forward to seize him, the unfortunate European receiving a blow from an umbrella and several other equally unpleasant attentions from the coolies. He was finally recaptured, and the rest of the journey to the station was without incident of note. When arrived there the Chief Inspector informed him that his arrest was a mistake, and apologized for the inconvenience caused him. This is the European's account of the affair.

That one side of a story is good until the other has been heard, is well illustrated by the recent arrest of a German subject in the Public Garden. According to to the accounts published, the arrested man suffered the most grievous wrongs. When peacefully watching a cricket match, he was apprehended by the police who, refusing to give him any information about the cause of his arrest or to display their warrant, marched him off to the station, using brutal and unnecessary violence en route and neither paying any attention to his explanations nor listening to his request to be taken to a place where he could be identified. But the version of the police is very different. They say that their attention was drawn to the man in the first instance by his obstreperous and unseemly behaviour; that, on observing him closely, they believed him to be a German sailor for whose arrest they had a warrant; that on asking him whether he belonged to a ship, they received a most insulting answer; that they invited him to proceed quietly to the station; that he defied them to take him there; that no sooner did they touch him than he struck one of them in the face; that he was shown the warrant at the outset, and that, on arriving at the station, he refused to give his name and address and became most abusive. On which side the whole truth lies we are unable to judge, but we do not hesitate to say that the story, as first published, was a little too highly coloured. It represented the police in a light to which their general conduct has not accustomed us.

Truly it is too silly that every incident of this kind should be made an occasion for pinning another rag on the scarecrow of Treaty Revision. Whatever inconvenience or apparent injustice a foreigner suffers is immediately pointed to by the prophets of evil as an example of the horrors to which we shall all be exposed after the abolition of Consular Jurisdiction. That sort of pessimism has become so hackneyed and has always been so irrational that even the leaders of the hue and cry should have grown tired and ashamed of it long ago. If the prejudice by which the critics are governed were even fractionally shared by the Japanese authorities, if the distrust and antipathy shown on one side did not immensely exceed the resentment and soreness felt by the other, there might be some reason for uneasiness. But the Japanese, despite the rude and truculent behaviour of a few coolies and students, are not really swayed by a desire to "get even" with the foreigner; and even if they were, the abolition of Consular Jurisdiction will not supply any new occasion for satisfying the wish. They would be more than human, indeed, were they not pretty weary of the reproaches perpetually cast in their teeth, from the biassed accusations of treaty-port journals to the discourteous injustice of memorialists who do not hesitate to proclaim that the Japanese Government can not be trusted beyond the limits of strict conventional restraint. It was under the influence of that natural impatience, we presume, that the Japan Times recently protested against the iterated and reiterated newspaper denunciations of Japanese mercantile morality. Criticism becomes unwholesome and mischievous when carried to such excesses that it betrays the critic's bias. Has not the time arrived for a little respite from these monotonous vaticinations about the pains that are in store for us after July 17th? What can be the use of crying out before we are hurt, unless, indeed, the object is to create a mood so morbidly sensitive and apprehensive as to preclude all chances of smooth relations?

THE KOBE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE AND FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF LAND IN JAPAN.

In the last issue of the Keizai Zasshi we find an account of the communications that have passed between the Foreign and Japanese Chambers of Commerce in Kobe with reference to the ownership of land by aliens in Japan. The Foreign Chamber assumed from the outset, and maintained to the last, the ground that unless aliens were allowed to own land and to become directors in Japanese Companies, no influx of foreign capital could be expected. The Japanese Chamber replied that, as to the ownership of land, it could not be effected except by a change of the law, and as to the question of directorship, no difficulty would present itself after the Revised Treaties went into operation. Meanwhile, since capital was urgently needed in Japan, the Chamber proposed that a bank should be established with foreign capital, the management to be in Japanese hands and foreigners to act as advisers. The Foreign Chamber expressed approval of the idea, but explained that to put it into immediate practice would be difficult, seeing that all the capital available for such a purpose was locked up in imported goods which had accumulated to an enormous degree owing to the failure of Japanese merchants to take delivery. If steps were promptly taken to correct that state of affairs, the bank project might be favorably considered, but the Chamber remained convinced that no really satisfactory result could be attained unless the privilege of owning land were conferred on foreigners.

The Keizai Zasshi, commenting on the above, says, in effect, that it sees no reason to take any step in the direction indicated by the Foreign Chamber. Not that the Keizai is opposed to the ownership of land by aliens. On the contrary, it expresses itself as emphatically in favour of granting that privilege, and would have the law amended without delay. But, so far as the influx of foreign capital is concerned, our contemporary fails to perceive what special effect the ownership of land could have one way or the other. The Kobe Chamber of Commerce does not, of course, suggest any immediate step with respect to this privilege. The foreign contention refers solely to the period subsequent to the operation of the Revised Treaties. What is claimed is that, under the system which those documents are intended to inaugurate, the conditions as to land tenure will not be such as to permit the introduction of foreign capital. Now, in the first place, although foreigners may not become land-owners, the Revised Treaties give them the right of acquiring mortgages on land, and, if land is to be taken as security for a loan, a mortgage is all that a creditor requires. In point of fact, immovable property is not a favorite form of security anywhere, but, apart from that consideration, the foreign capitalist labours under no disability if he wants to lend money on the security of land. In the second place, if the question turns on the investment of capital in industrial enterprises, there is no obstacle, for even without taking account of the long lease called chijoken, which is expressly designed to meet the case of factories, warehouses, or dwellings erected on hired land, there is the Treaty provision which entitles any business association of foreigners, or of foreigners and Japanese in combination, to obtain the status of a judicial person in Japan, and in that capacity to own as much land as may be desired. Finally, after the Revised Treaties go into operation, foreigners will of course be competent to become managing directors in Japanese companies. Therefore the Keizai thinks that as a period of ten months alone separates us from the date of the Treaties' going into effect, the best plan for all parties is to wait patiently.

There is a great deal of force, as it seems to us, in what the Keizai writes. But we submit two points for its consideration. The first is that a mortgage which does not carry with it right of possessing the thing mortgaged can not be regarded as thoroughly satisfactory security. That is especially true in the case of land. If the sale of the land has necessarily to follow immediately on the foreclosure of the mortgage, the mortgagee may find it very difficult to realize. It is true that a mortgage creditor is entitled to obtain satisfaction from any other property of his debtor should the sum accruing from the sale of the mortgaged immovable prove insufficient. But no lengthy argument is needed to show that a mortgage not including the right of possession greatly impairs the value of an immovable as security for a debt. The second point to which we invite the Keizai's attention is that the privileges attaching to the chijoken (superficies) and the hojin (judicial person), whatever character they may bear in the eyes of learned jurists, do not appeal directly to the understanding of the everyday individual. He feels perplexed and suspicious in the presence of such technical novelties, and he naturally asks why, if leases for two or three hundred years are to be permitted, and if ownership may be obtained by persons associated in business—why should not the far simpler and more intelligible form of tenure, namely proprietorship, be allowed. We believe that it will be greatly for the advantage of the Japanese to recognise these facts as soon as possible. They should do everything in their power to invite the confidence of foreign investors and to simplify the conditions of investment. The arrangements as to chijoken and hojin are very good, but the average foreigner, being quite unfamiliar with them, can not divest himself of some distrust as to the genuineness of their value.

THE FORMOSA RAILWAY.

The prospects of the Formosa Railway grew more and more obscure. On the 9th instant, the promoters held a meeting, when it was reported that the negotiations for foreign capital to build the line had virtually fallen through. Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi than expressed himself very strongly to the effect that to persist in an enterprise which they saw no hope of carrying to successful completion was foolish and unpractical, and that, in his opinion, they should at once dissolve the company. Some of the other promoters, however, urged that an alternative means of procuring capital still remained to be tried, and that no final step in the sense of dissolution should be taken pending a last effort. On that understanding the meeting was adjourned, but the Company's horizon is about as black as it could be.

A SECTIONAL ASSERTION OF OPINION.

We heard a great deal about Mr. Hoshi Toru when he was en route from Washington to Tokyo, but those who imagined that his return would be the signal for a political hurricane found themselves mistaken. Mr. Hoshi spoke with bated breath and declared that he had come to support the Cabinet as an outsider, not to force his way into its ranks. Still his return has evidently stiffened the backbone of the Kwanto Liberals whose leader he is. They held a meeting in the Kaikatei on the 6th instant, and came to the conclusion that application should be made for the summoning of an extraordinary general meeting of the Constitutional Party, in order to submit to it the following questions:—First, that since many "clan elements" remain in the central as well as in the Provincial Governments, determined steps to eliminate them must be taken at once. Secondly, that the Regulations for the Appointment of Officials ought to be abolished in toto. Thirdly, that the Departments of War and of the Navy must be brought within the same financial control as all the other offices of State. And fourthly, that a council should be appointed in order to complete the machinery of the Party.

These proposals are excellently calculated to produce a rupture in the Party, if they really have the earnest support of the Kwanto Section, and inasmuch as the latter has appointed an operative committee of ten to propagate its ideas, we must assume that it is not merely sending up a trial balloon. The wholesale elimination of the "clan elements" might be popular with the rank and file of the Constitutionalists, but the leaders of the Party—responsible statesmen like Counts Okuma and Itagaki—must be well aware that such heroic measures would completely discredit them in the eyes of the nation. The same remark applies with even greater force to the repeal of the Regulations for Official Appointments. The result of that step would be to bring all official appointments within the gift of the Cabinet Ministers, abolishing in toto the educational qualifications now required. Nothing could be more retrogressive. The so-called "Clan Statesmen" reduced the abuses of favoritism and patronage almost to a minimum when they introduced the system of appointment by examination, and if the Party Statesmen remove that safeguard, they will be deliberately re-opening the door to the very evils which they have always professed themselves so anxious to remove. We can not believe that the Kwanto politicians contemplate anything so suicidal, or would think of seceding from the Constitutional Party on such a platform.

ASSETLESS CHEQUES.

It is a curious thing that since the Japanese law for dealing with persons who circulate cheques which they know to be valueless, was promulgated in 1894, the number of offences of that nature has increased rather than diminished. The figures stand thus, according to the Yomiuri Shimbun:

	Persons offending.	Number of cheques.	Amount involved.
1895	12	17	2,020 yen.
1896	8	25	4.194 "
1897	66	101	62,553 "
1898 (to end of Aug.)	67	79	54.961 "

THE STORM.

The track of the recent storm lay through populous and prosperous districts of the country, and the havoc wrought by it has been correspondingly serious. Aichi Prefecture seems to have suffered most, as might have been expected, seeing that the tempest entered the mainland at Hamamatsu. The record for that prefecture alone is 35 houses washed away, 1,195 overthrown, 172 partially overthrown, 412 injured, and 5,578 inundated; 7 lives lost, embankments broken in 78 places, and arable land flooded to the extent of 11,825 acres. Chiba Prefecture, although it lay on the edge of the storm, suffered from heavy floods in the Tone and Yedo rivers, so that 1,165 houses were inundated, and 4,492 acres laid under water. Higher up also, the big Tone-gawa worked much mischief. In the Shimotsuga District (near Utsunomiya) it swept over its banks and the current, turning back, as it generally does in that region, laid a large expanse of country under water. The purifying reservoir of the Ashiwo Copper Mine was destroyed, and we shall doubtless hear another piteous tale of lands rendered barren by the poison. In Kofu Prefecture, 133 lives were lost—the heaviest record of all—and many houses and banks are reported to be destroyed as well as fields inundated, but exact figures are not given. Niigata suffered grievously. Twenty-six lives were lost; 128 houses were washed away, 948 injured and 6,000 inundated. From Nagano Prefecture "many dead" are reported, and in Hakodate and its environs 2,130 houses were inundated. Other parts of Hokkaido must also have suffered severely, but only 86 deaths are reported. Adding together all the figures thus far received, we obtain these results:—

Deaths	250
Houses swept away	164
Houses overthrown	1,195
Houses partially overthrown	1,460
Houses inundated	15,597
Banks broken	78
Arable lands inundated	15,317 acres

The last figure is undoubtedly much below the mark, as in some instances no attempt has been made to estimate the area under water.

On the 10th instant the Meteorological Authorities published a statement to the effect that, although their usual sources of intelligence were, for the most part, closed by the injury done to the telegraphs, they gathered that the atmospheric conditions throughout the country were disquieting, and that, although a short spell of fine weather might be expected, another storm was not unlikely to be felt in a few days. On the 12th instant, this warning was supplemented by a statement that low barometrical readings were reported from the south of Korea, from Riukiu and Hokkaido. In the case of Korea and the Riukiu Islands, however, there did not appear to be much reason for apprehension, but the Hokkaido depression suggested unpleasant consequences. This forecast seems well founded, if we may judge from present appearances.

Various statements, more or less contradictory, have been published with regard to the Banyu River and the possibility of crossing. Our Tokyo contemporaries unanimously alleged, in their issues of the 12th instant, that the river became impassable by boat on the 12th instant, and that all traffic by the Tokaido was suspended from that day. We presume that for some hours on the 12th the river was too heavily flooded for crossing by boat, but the interruption certainly did not continue long, for we have spoken with travellers who came through from Kodzu on the 13th and the 14th. The Railway bridge over the Banyu is badly injured—it is said that two of the pillars require partial re-building—, and several days will probably elapse before trains can pass. But, in the meanwhile, there is a service of boats. Passengers have to alight at Hiratsuka and find their way to the bank of the river either on foot, by carriage, or by boat. No difficulty is experienced in crossing, and a short walk on the other side brings one within reach of some means of conveyance to Chigasaki, where the train can be again taken. Japanese travellers complain bitterly of the failure of the police to exercise proper supervision during the early days of the ferrying operations. In the absence of all control, the boatsmen resorted to gross extortion and even intimidation. In one case it is alleged that a boat was stopped in mid-stream, and the voyage was not resumed until the passengers had paid up three yen. The sum is not appalling, but the method of obtaining it may have been disgreeable. Order has since been established.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF WHAT?

It has been suggested that an international exhibition in Tokyo should be organized in 1902, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of Japan. Never yet did a suggestion of that nature find its way into print without provoking some criticism. The objection raised on this occasion seems to us not wholly unreasonable. It is that the credit of introducing Japan to the world should not be given to Commodore Perry. Others countries had preceded him in endeavouring to make her emerge from her isolation. Perry came on March 6th, 1853, and went away on March 12th. A much more memorable event happened in that year, namely, the rescinding of the edict against sea-going ships. That was Japan's real emergence from her seclusion. The year 1902 will therefore be the 50th anniversary of her re-establishing communications with the outer world, not of the coming of Commodore Perry. Perry did not come here for Japan's sake. Not one little bit. If the plain truth be spoken, he came to force Japan to do a thing which she greatly objected to do, and his act was prompted, not by the smallest solicitude for Japan's welfare, but simply by a desire to benefit America. From an outsider's point of view, the Commodore's coming may seem to have been a very fine thing for Japan; from Japan's point of view the treaty that she was compelled by force majeure to sign can only be regarded as a national humiliation. The exponents of that view, headed by the Nippon, are strongly in favour of marking 1903 by an international exhibition, but they propose to call it "the celebration of the 50th aniniversary of the re-opening of communications." The argument will appeal to many minds. We ourselves have not the smallest faith in sentiments founded on unreal bases. Only an unthinking Japanese can regard Perry's coming and the course adopted by him as a fitting cause for national rejoicing. We celebrate our recovery from a malady, not the fact that a physician administered to us some doses of very nasty medicine. But, after all, has there been any talk of a great national fête to commemorate Perry's advent? We have not heard it. What we have heard is a proposal to commemorate the opening of Japan. Whether that was accomplished by the coming of a foreign envoy or by the signing of a treaty or by sanctioning the construction of sea-going ships, is not a question under discussion.

THE MINISTER OF STATE FOR EDUCATION.

It is alleged that Mr. Ozaki Yukio has tendered his resignation. The statement does not come from an Opposition journal, but from the Liberal organ (Tokyo Shimbun). The Minister of Education is said to have visited Count Okuma on the 5th instant, and expressed a desire to give up his portfolio on the ground that he felt himself unworthy of, and unsuited for, the office. He explained that he would never have thought of soliciting, still less of claiming, such an honour, inasmuch as he was fully sensible that many members of the Party were much better entitled to it than he, but when he found that his name had been included among those of the men selected by the General Committee for recommendation to the Emperor, he had been unwilling to make himself exceptional by declining. Of course Count Okuma endeavoured to remove his scruples, but he is said to have remained firm in his purpose.

The above rumour is confirmed by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun and the Chiuo Shimbun. Indeed, it was published by those two journals on the 7th instant—that is to say, the day before it appeared in the columns of the Tokyo Shimbun—but as they are both Opposition papers, we did not attach credence to the story. The Nippon, an independent journal, denies it altogether, and we sincerely hope that the denial is correct. Mr. Ozaki, during his brief tenure of office, has proved himself not merely a man of exceptional ability—that he was always known to be—but a statesman of most liberal and enlightened convictions, with all the courage of them. It is not for that reason, however, that his resignation would be particularly regrettable, but because the public could not fail to attribute it to a cause so paltry that to attach any serious importance to it would make the nation ridiculous. The newspapers giving vogue to the rumour frankly, assert that Mr. Ozaki's reason is his unwillingness to increase the difficulties of the cabinet by saddling it with the unpopularity of his recent reference to a republic in Japan. A section of the House of Peers is understood to have taken up that question somewhat vehemently, and as the relations between the Ministry and the Peers are already of a nature to render the legislative outlook decidedly gloomy, the Minister of Education thinks it right to sacrifice himself rather than increase the tension. One can admire such a spirit on the part of Mr. Ozaki, while doubting very strongly whether, as a public man, he is justified in seeming to attach any value whatever to such a farcical pretext as that of which some of the Peers are supposed to be making political capital. What Mr. Ozaki said was that the sway of money had become more potent in Japan than even in the so-called home of plutocracy, America, for while the Americans never think of making a Gould or a Vanderbilt President, the Japanese, if they had a republic, would probably place an Iwasaki or a Mitsui in the Presidential chair. If that be counted a disloyal utterance, or regarded as displaying disrespect to the Emperor, we can only say that the sentiment of reverence towards the Throne has become morbidly diseased, and that men like Mr. Ozaki should endeavour to correct it rather than defer to it.

YOKOHAMA'S COMMERCE.

The Commissioner of Customs at Yokohama has made some interesting comments on the present and future of the port's commerce. The excess of imports, he says, during the first six months of this year, aggregated 27,614,164 yen, whereas, during the corresponding period last year, the balance swung the other way, exports exceeding imports by 2,932,414 yen. The statement may perhaps surprise some of our readers, but the fact is that the trade of Kobe, not the trade of Yokohama, was responsible last year for the heavy balance against Japan. The total value of Yokohama's trade was 177 million yen, in round numbers, and the total value of Kobe's trade, 161 millions, but while the imports at Kobe exceeded the exports by nearly 60 million yen, the exports from Yokohama exceeded the imports by 3½ millions. This year, however, a portion of the very large balance against Japan stands to Yokohama's account. The unfavourable feature of the commerce was, not that exports increased, in the January-June period, by 22½ million yen —that is a matter for congratulation rather than regret—, but that the bulk of the exports diminished by nearly 8 millions. After May, however, signs of improvement began to show themselves in the export trade, whereas the import trade plainly commenced to suffer from the general tightness in the money market and the paralysis that overtook all enterprises, while, at the same time, the prospect of a fine harvest at home checked the inflow of foreign rice. The Superintendent says that at one time the glut of imported goods was enormous. It seemed almost impossible that they could be worked off. But gradually the stock was diminished, and daylight is now visible. The fault lay primarily with Japanese merchants, who, unless they can see their way clearly to a profit, are always reluctant to implement their contracts by taking delivery of goods. Foreign traders, however, probably showed an over-sanguine trustfulness, and will be more cautious in future. Mr. Mizukami ridicules the notion that large imports have been made, or will be made, in anticipation of the operation of the new Tariff. He says that the interest on money is much too high to permit anything of that kind, but we find difficulty in following his argument, for a respectable foreign merchant does not pay more than 8 per cent. for accommodation, and if, by anticipating the Tariff, he had to lose three months' interest—or 2 per cent.—he might stand to gain 5, 10, or even 15 per cent. by avoiding the increased duties. However, it is doubtless true, as the Superintendent remarks, that when business is brisk, an increase of duty within certain limits has little, if any, effect upon demand. Mr. Mizukami deprecates the Government's policy of purchasing bonds. He thinks that it has the effect of checking the decline of prices to a normal level, and that the wiser plan would be to let things take their uninterrupted course.

DISTURBANCE IN KOSUGE PRISON.

A serious fracas between warders and prisoners occurred on the 9th instant in the jail at Kosuge, a suburb of Tokyo. The origin of the trouble is somewhat obscure, but it would appear that two or three of the convicts harboured some grudge against a warder called Sugi Seizaki. One of them engaged him in conversation and another, approaching from behind, knocked him down with a spade. In the commotion that ensued, a convict under sentence for robbery and manslaughter obtained possession of the warden's sword and struck him with such effect that his left arm was nearly severed at the shoulder. Several warders who came to the assistance of their comrade were ultimately obliged to draw their swords, and the convict who had wounded Sugi received an ugly gash in the affray. The unfortunate warder's life is despaired of.

DYSENTERY.

August is the fatal month of the year par excellence when dysentery is in the field. Last year, the number of cases from January to July was 8,633, and the number during the month of August 33,443, making a total of 42,126. This year, the corresponding figures are 14,998, 28,115 and 43,113 respectively. Judging by the records for the first seven months, August of the current year should have been much more disastrous than August, 1897. In fact, had the proportion of 1897 held in 1898, there should have been 58,187 cases in August, instead of only 28,115. It appears to be thought that the comparatively favourable record is due to the great exertions of the Sanitary Authorities—a reasonable theory, for, judging by Tokyo, the hygienic precautions adopted are most thorough. Yamagata, Nagano and Niigata Prefectures are suffering most at present, but there are happily signs of a diminution everywhere.

THE SÖUL FUSAN RAILWAY.

Particulars of the charter granted by the Korean Government for the construction of the Söul-Fusan Railway have been communicated by telegraph to the Yomiuri Shimbun. The conditions are these :—(1) That the work of construction must be commenced within three years. (2) That the building must be finished within 15 years. (3) That the concession must not be sold except to the Government of Japan, or the Government of Korea, or to Japanese or Korean subjects. (4) That Korean subjects shall have the privilege of becoming shareholders. (5) That the Korean Government shall have the right to purchase the road should the finances of the State permit. (6) That all other conditions shall be identical with those operative in the case of the Söul-Chemulpo line.

STREET RAILWAYS IN TOKYO.

Referring, some time ago, to the matter of street railways in Tokyo, we noted that the Tokyo Municipality had decided to take up the work itself, it being understeed that the Central Government also was in favour of that course, rather than of abandoning such enterprises to private initiative. We read now, in vernacular newspapers, that application for a charter was recently presented by the Municipal Council to the Minister of Home Affairs, and that Count Itagaki has rejected it as irregular. Such a dénouement naturally creates some astonishment, but the explanation appears simple enough. The fact is that the Home Department's competence to grant applications of the kind is not unlimited. If the motive power employed in the projected system be electricity, the right to give permission is restricted to the Department of Communications, by regulations enacted only last year. Hence as the applicants failed to specify the exact nature of their scheme, the Home Department was, of course, unable to grant to them a charter which would have conferred the general privilege of building and working any and every kind of line. They are not a little laughed at for their ineptitude in disabling themselves by ignorance of a fundamental technicality, and it seems to be thought that there is no way of retrieving the error. The latter conclusion, however, is evidently extravagant. We presume that Tokyo will emerge, some day or other, from the unprogressive slough in which it has wallowed for so many years. This blunder of the Municipal Council helps to explain the perpetual deadlock.

It appears that the Municipal Council of Tokyo did not bungle quite so badly as was originally supposed in the matter of their application for permission to build street railways. They stated clearly enough that the system they proposed to adopted was atmospheric, but they failed to furnish the details required by regulation, and when the Home Department asked them for fuller particulars, they were only able to reply that they had transmitted verbatim the resolution passed by the City Assembly. It will be necessary for the Assembly to develop a more practical mood, and doubtless the next attempt made by the Council will succeed.

THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

All the vernacular journals report that Mr. Komura, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, is to go as Japan's Representative to Washington, and that he will be succeeded at the Foreign Office by Dr. Hatoyama Kazuo. They add that Dr. Hatoyama does not accept the post of Vice-Minister unconditionally. He has been promised the position of Ambassador to an European Court. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun makes a different statement: it alleges that he is to have a portfolio by and by. With regard to the former rumour, it is to be observed that Japan has no Ambassadors in Europe, and that she is very unlikely to send any unless the European Powers also accredit Ambassadors to her Court.

COUNT OKUMA'S PARTY.

Count Okuma's séance on the 12th instant was by no means so solemn an affair as some of the published accounts suggest. The object seems to have been quite frankly indicated. It was to establish good relations with the members of the House of Peers and to avert the collision which seems not unlikely to occur next session between the two Houses. About a hundred and ten persons attended. The number is alleged to have been only half of those invited, but whether the smallness of the response is to be considered significant we do not know. Count Okuma spoke with his usual eloquence and directness. Eight years, he said, had passed since the Diet came into existence, and throughout the whole time collisions between the Administration and the Legislature had been frequent. Again and again the Diet had been dissolved, and five times the ministry had been changed, greatly to the detriment of the national interests and the discharge of State business. He himself had been called to office at a time when the administration was more or less dislocated and the finances out of order, yet, though sensible of his inability, he had not ventured to escape the responsibility and had the firm resolve to work to the utmost of his capacities. Happily the disposition of the House of Representatives was favourable, and no apprehension need be entertained of any repetition of past troubles. But—and here the Count spoke with great emphasis—a collision with the House of Peers might have the same fatal effect in impeding the progress of public business as a collision with the House of Representatives. That contingency caused him much concern. It had been his desire to submit all the Government's intentions for the consideration and approval of the Peers, but to his great regret so many matters had called for urgent attention during his still-brief tenure of office, that no such step had hitherto been possible. The opening of the session was now close at hand, but nevertheless an interval remained, and he intended to utilize it for placing before them the drafts of all the Government's Bills and discussing their details. On the other hand, he trusted that if they had any proposals to make, they would formulate them without reserve, for he undertook, on his side, to give them the fullest consideration as bases of reform.

The Premier's speech, it will be seen, was very much to the point, and is said to have produced an excellent effect. Only one person thought of replying to it, and that was Professor Toyama. As usual he framed his remarks so that the strain of irony underlying them was apparent only to the shrewdest of his hearers. Marquis Ito, he said, had handed over the Administration to the political parties, thereby running counter to the views of all his friends and partizans, and for thus severing himself from his followers he had been compared by the Mainichi Shimbun to Sir Robert Peel. If the comparison held in Marquis Ito's case, then Count Okuma might be likened to Lord Grey. Grey had organized his cabinet with Russell, Brougham, Durham, and so forth, and had undertaken a large scheme of reform, which involved first an appeal to the country and then a collision with the House of Lords. But Grey's manner of dealing with the Lords was conclusive. He created a sufficient number of new peers to secure a majority for his measure. Why should not Count Okuma follow that precedent? Japan needed reform now more than England needed it in Grey's time. Besides, there were ample reasons for creating new peers. Count Okuma ought to take his courage in both hands and do the thing boldly. The Professor declared himself able to indicate several suitable recipients of such a distinction. There was Mr. Mayejima, for example, who had rendered such good service in connection with navigation, and there was Mr. Yano Fumio, who had all the mien of a peer. Lord Grey's device was the best exit from the dilemma.

While the Professor's hearers were looking at one another uncertain how to receive his speech, Count Okuma replied laughingly that although he had been advised to do as Peel had done, no one had previously recommended him to follow Grey's example. Many good people urged him to adopt the policy of increasing the Land Tax, in spite of his Party's objection, just as Peel had repealed the Corn Laws in the teeth of Conservative opposition, but he found himself unable to be even a Peel. How was it to be expected, then, that he could be a Grey?

The Professor, of course, had his reply ready, and would have spoken again, but Baron Suzuki interfered, suggesting that they had not met for the purpose of debating. Thereat the Professor turned on him and said:—"Quite so. It's all very fine for you who are the happy possessor of a Baron's patent. You may have nothing to say. But remember that I am not so fortunately circumstanced."

THE RICE CROP.

Just before the recent storm, an estimate of the probable yield of rice this year was made by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce. Collating the reports received from the various producing districts, the Department arrived at the conclusion that the crop would amount to 45,760,000 koku, which is 12,760,000 koku greater than last year's yield—that is to say, an increase of 38.69 per cent.—and 7,200,000 koku, or 18.68 per cent. greater than the average crop of the past seven years (the average is calculated by omitting the best year and the worst in the seven, and considering the remaining five only). This estimate will be more or less disturbed by the storm, but it is not expected that there will be any very great difference; certainly not enough to reduce the crop to 40 million koku. Forty million koku would still be 7 millions more than last year, and 7 million koku of rice represents at least 90 million yen. The agricultural classes ought to find themselves prosperous this fall, though the crops of millet and cotton have suffered severely.

THE PURCHASE OF LOAN BONDS.

The Bank of Japan continues its purchases of Loan Bonds. Sellers have become very scarce, however. In Tokyo they are practically nil, but applications still continue to be received on a small scale from country districts. Up to the 9th instant, the total purchases effected by the Bank were 35 million yen. It is stated that the Government intends to continue the policy in order to maintain the market price of the Bonds at 96, which is the minimum figure paid by the Bank.

COURT MOURNING.

It is now evident that the Court of Japan does not intend to go into mourning for the Empress of Austria. We can not be surprised that such a resolve has been taken. When the Empress Dowager Yeisho died last year, the only European Court that observed the ceremonial customary on such occasions where friendly States are concerned was the Court of Madrid. It was well understood that the Emperor and Empress of Japan were considerably pained by such neglect, especially as the Japanese Court had punctiliously discharged its duty towards European Courts in this respect. Some attempt was made to rebut the charge of discourtesy naturally preferred on Japan's behalf—preferred, not by the Court, of course, not yet officially, but by public opinion. The excuse offered was that the Japanese had themselves to blame, since, when about to announce mourning for European Royal or Imperial personages, they had failed to stipulate for a reciprocal mark of respect from the Court concerned, should occasion arise. Perhaps the Japanese code of politeness does not contemplate such stipulations. This country's conception of civility, we imagine, is that the right thing should be done without bargaining for a return. At all events, the plain facts are that, between 1881 and 1886, the Japanese Court went into mourning twelve times for European potentates, and that when the Empress Dowager of Japan died in 1897, not one European Court, except that of Spain, showed a corresponding mark of respect. Two out of the twelve acts of mourning had been on account of the Austrian Court; one for the death of the Crown Prince in 1889, and one for the death of the Arch-Duke Charles in 1896. Yet the Austrian Court failed to pay similar respect to the memory of the Empress Dowager Yeisho. It was very natural, therefore, that Japan should have hesitated on the present occasion. We say "hesitated" advisedly, for, after she had uniformly, throughout a period of 15 years, afforded practical proof of her readiness to comply with the dictates of civilized etiquette, it is not to be supposed that her one experience last year would have finally deterred her from further observance of the graceful custom. She would assuredly have adopted the same course on the present occasion had she been duly approached, though she might be unwilling to adopt it without some assurance that no repetition of last year's neglect should be practised towards herself. We are driven to conclude, therefore, that the Austrian Court did not find itself in a position to offer any such assurance; in other words, that Austria is not prepared to abandon the attitude hitherto observed by all European States except Spain towards Oriental Powers. Last year, it was simply a sin of conservative omission. Mourning had never been worn by a Western Court for an Eastern potentate. The neglect had the sanction of custom and the excuse of inadvertence. But no explanation of the kind can now be urged in view of the discussion which took place after the death of the Empress Dowager Yeisho. The responsibility rests with Austria. We do not care to express in words the full import of her procedure.

LI HUNG-CHANG.

A telegram from Peking assigns a curious reason for Earl Li's removal, or dismissal, from the Presidency of the Tsung-li Yamên. It is said that whenever the British Representative had any occasion to consult the Yamên, everything that passed was immediately reported to the Russian Legation, and that Li was the channel of communication. The cause and the consequence having been clearly discovered, the British Minister naturally declined to have any further dealings with the Tsung-li Yamên so long as Li remained a member of it. Hence his fall. Is that story true, we wonder? It sounds scarcely credible. Yet there seems to be no doubt that Lord Salisbury directed Her Majesty's Representative in Peking to prefer some kind of complaint against Earl Li, and there are equally good reasons for thinking that the old Viceroy had been playing into Russia's hands ever since the Liaotung coup of 1895. Some people do not hesitate to say that he was bribed, magnificently bribed; and others, without attaching great credence to the bribery tale, are disposed to call him a traitor to his country. We can not see that it is necessary either to believe the former view, or to endorse the latter. His wealth is already so great that he ought to be beyond the reach of bribes, even supposing him capable of selling his country, and he has served her in such a way throughout a long life that no supposition of the kind should be justly entertainable. He is said to be immensely rich, and an exceptionally rich official in China is generally assumed to be exceptionally corrupt. It is a nice problem, however, to determine the exact significance of the word "corrupt" in China's public vocabulary. A very large amount of what we call peculation and even robbery is recognised as part of the Chinese administrative system. The great offices of State are virtually farmed out, and their holders are expected to make as much of them as they can without provoking the people to rebellion or the censors to protest. Earl Li may have utilized his opportunities adroitly without ever forfeiting his self-respect. But between that and taking a bribe from a foreign Power against the interests of his own country, there is an immense interval. Did the old statesman cross it? We can not think so. As to his playing into Russia's hands, the idea is not in the least incompatible with genuine patriotism. He may have deduced from his long experience the lesson that China's only chance of retaining some shreds of independence is to court Russia's favour and forbearance. We Englishmen naturally think that he should have thrown himself into British arms, but how do the Russians view that notion? They doubtless think that Li has been behaving like a genuine patriot, and that if he preferred the Bear's hug to the Lion's jaws, he made a wise and statesmanlike choice. At all events, without applying any offensive epithets to a man who in his day, and that a long day, towered head and shoulders above all his countrymen, who certainly tried to make China great, and who was once a sincere friend of England, we may be permitted, as British subjects, to express satisfaction that he no longer presides at the Tsung-li Yamên.

JAPANESE GOVERNMENT FORESTS.

There is a good deal of talk just now about the forests possessed by the State in Japan. According to Mr. Oishi, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, these forests cover an area of 18¾ million acres and are worth three hundred million yen. Yet the gross revenue derived from them is only 1½ million yen, of which about a million goes to defray expenditures. Of course that is a ludicrously small return. Mr. Oishi has a plan to propose. It is that the finances of the forests should be relegated to special accounts—that is to say, made independent of the ordinary incomings and outgoings of the Treasury—and that the small forests, namely, those covering an area of less than 125 acres, should be sold, and the proceeds devoted to purchasing private forest lands which now break the continuity of Government forests, as well as to planting and to the repairing of river banks. His Excellency calculates that the small forests coming into this category would sell for about 24 million yen, and his idea is to spread the sale equally over ten years. Specially low rates would be granted to public associations (kōkyō dantai), and to temples or shrines having exceptional claims to a particular forest, but in all other cases the method of public tender would be resorted to. Referring to this subject, the Yomiuri says that the net income derived by Japan from her forests is only 3.3 sen per cho (2½ acres), whereas in Europe the income varies from 80 sen to 10 yen. There is also the question of moors. Those cover an area of 5½ million cho, or 13¾ million acres, and apparently produce nothing at all. It is certainly time that some step was taken to derive a reasonable profit from such a valuable asset.

TAXATION.

The party that favours an increase of the Land Tax seems to be gaining strength. It now includes, according to the Kokumin, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Home Affairs, Baron Kusumoto, Messrs. Kataoka, Yehara, Shimada, Haseba, Kaino, Taguchi, and Hoshi, so that, out of the 11 members constituting the General and the Finance Committees of the Constitutional Party, the opponents number three only, Messrs. Inugai, Taketomi, and Komuchi. Meanwhile the Cabinet is supposed to be in favour of making no change in the tax on agricultural lands, but of increasing the tax on urban building lands by a thousand per cent. There is no doubt that such an increase would not be excessive in the case of some parts of the principal cities, Tokyo, Osaka, and Kyoto, where the market value of land is immensely higher than the value assessed for purposes of taxation; but it would be unjust if applied to other parts even of the Three Cities, and more still more unjust in many of the urban districts throughout the provinces. The fact is that no drastic measure can be properly taken without careful reassessment. A small increase of the Land Tax, such as that contemplated by the last Cabinet, might be carried out without too onerously accentuating the inequalities that now exist in the incidence of the impost, but when it comes to multiplying the tax by ten, differentiations which are now insignificant might become intolerably excessive.

MR. OISHI'S SPEECH.

We have already referred to the speech recently delivered by the Minister of State for Agriculture and Commerce, in which his Excellency took the line that the forces of European international disturbance find their alternative lines of least resistance in Turkey and the Far East, so that when any question connected with Turkey is on the tapis, the Far East enjoys tranquillity, and vice versâ. Only the outlines of the speech were published originally, but it subsequently appeared in extenso in the organ of the Constitutional Party, and it proves to be an oration not distinguished by the reserve that the public utterances of responsible statesmen usually display. Germany is evidently regarded by Mr. Oishi as chiefly responsible for the state of unrest prevailing in the Far East. She is accused of having, by her action at Kiao-chou, virtually invited Russia to exercise a free hand in Manchuria; she is spoken of as having truckled to Russia in order to separate the latter from France, and she is said to have deliberately fomented a Far-Eastern question so that the lists of combat might be as distant from Europe as possible. There are plenty of combustible materials lying around in Europe, the Minister thinks, and if a spark were thrown among them, the smoke of the explosion would effectually conceal from the eyes of the continent everything beyond its own borders. Mr. Oishi does not actually say, in so many words, that Japan should endeavour to throw the spark, but it is difficult to interpret his speech in any other sense, seeing that, after clearly declaring the importance of making Europe look at home instead of abroad, he counsels the despatch of Japanese Ministers to Turkey, Roumania, Greece, Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro.

This speech is vehemently criticised by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, which, as we have already observed, is now the Cabinet's most trenchant censor. The Minister is charged by our contemporary with exceeding the limits of legitimate comment, and with using language calculated to inspire uneasiness about Japan's designs and to discredit her foreign policy. But in truth the Nichi Nichi seems a little hypercritical. Japan's doings in the Balkan Peninsula are not likely to be seriously considered by any European Power. The unpractical character of the Minister's speech is the only point to which attention will be paid.

HOKKAIDO.

Hokkaido comprises 6,137 square ri of territory and has an area 18 square ri greater than that of Shikoku, Kiushiu and Formosa combined. It arable land is said to measure 7¼ million acres, and it could probably support from 20 to 30 million people. The growth of its population since 1891 is shown in the following table:—

ALCOHOL SMUGGLING.

The police are said to have made a seizure of smuggled alcohol in Tokyo. They received information from the Customs authorities in Yokohama that eight or nine boats, carrying some three thousand cases of alcohol, had left Yokohama on the 7th instant. Steps were therefore taken to intercept the boats on arrival, but after the various steam-launches and other craft employed by the police had lain in wait until the evening of the day when the boats should have passed the forts, they learned by telegraph that the storm had probably dislocated the smugglers' programme. Strict watch was kept, none the less, and on the 10th inst. a suspicious-looking boat was observed at the bank of the Sumida River near the Namiyoke Inari in Tsukiji. Before any seizure could be made, however, the boat effected its escape. On the evening of the 11th, a cargo-boat manned by three sendo entered the Kanasugi River, and, when the police made their appearance, one of the men fled forthwith. The other two were arrested, and in the boat were found 20 cases of alcohol, addressed by Hitachi-ya of Masago-cho in Yokohama to Kameda Shōten of Shikoku-machi, Shiba. It is alleged that a foreign house in Yokohama is connected with this affair, but the whole story is somewhat vague.

It appears that 8 cargo-boats loaded with cases of alcohol left Yokohama on the 5th instant for Tokyo, but, owing to heavy weather, they put into Kanagawa for shelter. Two, however, were almost immediately sent on, as the speedy delivery of a portion at least of the goods was an object. Of these two, one was captured at Kanasugi, as already related, and the other barely escaped seizure when about to land its cargo at Tsukiji. The Kanasugi boat contained 140 cases of alcohol, 28 of which had duly passed the Customs and were properly consigned to the Kameda firm. The remaining 112 were smuggled. It is now alleged that the foreign firm concerned in the business is No. 29, Yokohama, but no evidence is published in support of the assertion. We read in a Tokyo journal that the capture of the Kanasugi boat was due to a detective on duty at the Shinagawa forts. He observed two suspicious-looking craft pass the forts coming from the direction of Yokohama, and he followed the one that made for Kanasugi. Rumour says that the police have succeeded in seizing the six boats which put into Kanagawa.

THE KOREAN POISONING AFFAIR.

Another "episode" has been added to the Sovereign of Korea's chequered record. When the telegraph announced, on the 13th instant, that an attempt had been made to poison His Majesty on the 11th, that for a time his life had been in danger, and that the remedies applied had been so far successful, most people concluded, we imagine, that the end had really come, and, that official expediency alone prevented a frank announcement. That apprehension seems to have been baseless, however. It would appear that the Emperor's life has been saved, and that he is out of danger so far as this particular attempt is concerned. With regard to the author or authors of the crime and the motives inspiring it, there is as yet no information. The impression naturally is that some connexion exists between this attempt and the conspiracy discovered in July to bring about the Sovereign's abdication. But we need not discuss impressions. The July affair entailed disastrous consequences for the plotters and it is permissible to hope that the criminals will fare equally badly on the present occasion.

It is now said that the Korean poisoners aimed at the life not merely of the Emperor, but also of the Crown Prince and of one of the Imperial "Vice-Wives." The first telegram—received by the Asahi Shimbun—spoke of the Emperor only, but subsequent messages included the Prince Imperial, and now Lady An is added to the list of intended victims. Some irreverent folks whisper that the poison may have had no existence outside the imagination of the courtiers: that, in short, His Majesty supped upon unwholesome fish, and that the assassin theory was suggested either in the interests of the cook or in obedience to political motives. Another hypothesis is that the crime had its origin in the discontent of the pro-Russian party, who are chagrined at the growth of Japanese influence; and yet another that Lady Yuen was the deviser of the plot. A certain interest attaches to these conjectures, but their bare statement is sufficient.

THE BOURSES.

The bourse system is making a bad record in Japan. In 1893, when Count Goto held the portfolio of Agriculture and Commerce, quite a mania developed itself for the new enterprise—not new in nature but only in organization—so that, in the course of a few years, bourses were established at no less than 132 places, the number of brokers connected with them being 2,761, and their aggregate capital 10,293,000 yen. The law forbids transactions in margins, but it is easy to see that the law is a dead letter in that respect, if the figures showing the transactions in rice be examined. We take them from a vernacular contemporary, which quotes the latest statistics of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce:—

	Quantity of Rice dealt in at the Exchanges. Koku.	Rice crop of the preceding year. Koku.
1892	41,673,210	38,123,548
1893	40,745,740	41,378,956
1894	76,832,000	37,199,663
1895	73,743,510	41,865,896
1896	75,504,950	39,878,629

These figures are sufficiently significant as they stand, but they become doubly striking when we remember that only a very small fraction of the year's yield of rice is disposed of at the bourses—not more than a thousandth part, according to the general calculation. It is evident, therefore, that enormous transactions in margins are carried on. Public attention is drawn to the subject at present owing to heavy defalcations that have recently taken place on the part of the brokers, and it is urged that the system wants complete remodelling.

The China Mail says that Aguinaldo has resolved to send a number of ambassadors to the courts of Europe to plead the cause of the Philippine natives. It is said the people of Batangas and neighbouring provinces are rallying round their leader, and supporting a policy of independence. The steamer Pasig, which has been renamed the Abbey, has landed a cargo of arms for the rebels at Batangas.

POLITICS.

It is plain that a resolute attempt is being made in some quarters to bring about a rupture between the Liberals and the Progressists. The material employed just at present by the sowers of dissension is the action of the Kwanto section under the leadership of Mr. Hoshi Toru, and an apparent re-establishment of good relations between Count Itagaki and certain prominent men who seceded from the Liberal camp last year. The Kwanto section—which commands thirty votes in the Lower House—is certainly taking a very resolute stand, and the radical proposals attributed to it—e.g. the elimination of all "clan elements" from the Administration and the compete repeal of the regulations for Official appointments—, are pretty sure to produce discord if they are persistently pushed. But as to Count Itagaki's renewal of his old friendships, we see no reason to draw any sinister inferences from it. The Liberal organ (Tokyo Shimbun) insists, and has repeatedly insisted, that all these stories are the inventions of folks who wish them to be true, and that there is not the slightest fear of a rupture between the two parties, since they both realize that to fall asunder now would be to sacrifice the results for which they have worked during nearly a quarter of a century and to imperil the success of party government.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST ISSUE.)

We take from the Gokyō some statistics bearing on the progress of the Methodist Mission, which did not appear in the report of the Annual Methodist Conference published in these columns. It is stated that the following figures represent the growth of the Church during the year:—At Sapporo, among 247 attendants at services there were 14 baptisms. In Sendai the attendants were 425 and the baptisms 37. In Hakodate there were 78 baptisms among 445 attendants. In Kagoshima 83 attendants and 8 baptisms. In Nagasaki 570 attendants and 72 baptisms. In Nagoya 281 attendants and 40 baptisms. Infant baptisms are not included in these figures. In addition to these there are 1,558 catechumens, being 360 more than last year. The total number of baptisms is 483,* being 35 less than last year. Sunday School scholars number 8,195, being 140 more than last year. The total amount of money subscribed for religious purposes, exclusive of money given for the repair of churches, was 9,349 yen, being an increase of 1,027 yen over last year.

The Fukuin Shimpō has an article entitled "The Union of the Churches," in which the great difficulties in the way of union are enumerated and certain schemes of joint action are discussed. One proposal made is that the churches create a legislative assembly, a kind of House of Reprsentatives, each member representing 1,000 Christians, and that to this body be entrusted the forming of a Constitution and the drafting of ecclesiastical canons; that the aim be to give to individuals as much liberty as possible, and yet to require faithful observence of the provisions of the Constitution. It is contended in the organ we are quoting that the difficulty of getting such a scheme to work harmoniously would be very great. Japanese Christians are accustomed to their own sects and echo and re-echo their own watchwords. The doctrinal differences that exist it would be very hard to get rid of. Mr. Honda Yoichi thinks that there is no plan better than a union of foreigners and Japanese in evangelistic efforts as heretofore and that there is little use in attempting what is bound to prove impracticable.

No. 160 of the publication we have just quoted contains an interesting article by Mr. Uemura Masahisa, in which he contends that the stage of progress which religious thought has reached in any country may be determined by examining the wording of the prayers which it is customary to offer up. The mass of worshippers who assemble at Asakusa to pray to Kwannon, at Narita to supplicate Fudō and at the grave of Nezumi Kozō,† to pay tribute to his departed spirit are all in search of earthly gain of some kind or other. The 古事類苑 Kojirutyen, under, the heading of Kami (gods), furnishes the texts of a number of prayers used in ancient times and the middle ages. These prayers are permeated with a mercenary spirit. Their object, in a large number of instances, is worldly benefit to the supplicant. The origin of the Japanese word for prayer, inori, is said to be imi noru‡, the declaration of what is disliked or abstained from. Hence we see the prayer was of a purely personal type. A kind of bargain was made with the god by the worshipper that a quid pro quo should be given in the form of some offering or the erection or repair of a shrine. Accustomed to this idea of prayer, many Japanese even after they have become Christians regard religion as one of the means of attaining worldly ends; the spirit of the trader still remains, as is constantly evidenced by remarks made by Christians. The believers who are overawed by the greatness of God, who are impressed by the sublimity of Christianity are few. By the majority religion is regarded only as the supplier of certain wants. On the lips of these Christians the words "God's grace," and "Providence," "the mercy of God," all have a personal and very limited reference. This is their way of confessing that they have got their own desires gratified by worshipping God. It is the old mercenary spirit of the ancient Shintoist or Buddhist over again. The horizon of the supplicant is bounded by his own personality. This we consider one of the defects of Japanese Christianity, says Mr. Uemura.

Another undesirable characteristic of prevailing belief and practice in the Christian Church is a consequence of the feudalism to which for so many centuries the Japanese were accustomed. God is regarded as a kind of lord whose duty it is to lead his followers against their many foes, and faithfulness to the leader is not the result of admiration of His character, but savours of the blind loyalty which in ancient times was both practised and enjoined even though the masters served were wicked men. To many Christians God has merely taken the place of the tonosama that they used to serve. Slavish subservience of an undiscerning, bigoted and servile type is all they have been accustomed to and this they still manifest. Many years ago, the catechisms and manuals in use in the Christian Church set forth the perfections of the Godhead. He was represented as the all-wise and all-powerful God, without beginning and without end. Those who entered the Church at that time, like myself, were much impressed by the grandeur of the Christian conception of Divinity. But in modern times these descriptions are not often to be met with. It is rather the fashion to discourse of the grace of God, of the help He gives to man, and of His guidance. God has been lowered and represented as very near to man. Access to him has been made an easy matter. He is no longer enshrouded in an awe-inspiring grandeur. Along with this lowering of the conception of the character of God there has been the prevalence of religious mercenariness, the use of Christianity for utilitarian purposes of a purely personal type. All this is to be regretted.

Two other articles from the pen of Mr. Uchimura Kanzō lie before us. Both alike are extremely pessimistic in tone. Mr. Uchimura's writings, however, are usually interesting and instructive. There is no doubt that he is very earnest and very sincere, in addition to being well informed on the history of Christianity in Japan. An essay entitled Konnichi no Konnan dwells on the general unrest of the Japanese mind and the wrong use that it has made of principles borrowed from Western lands, such as the principle of liberty, for instance. In the other article to which we have referred the want of thoroughness and perseverance in the work of the Church is dwelt upon. So many different enterprises are begun, observes Mr. Uchimura, only to be allowed to collapse after a few months or a few years, or to be eclipsed by undertakings that have no greater promise of permanency and efficiency. The excitement of starting something fresh gives an appearance of zeal to the persons who interest themselves in it, but such people soon weary of well-doing. Notwithstanding all that has been done in the way of works of benevolence during the past two years, I cannot say that I see any signs of great growth in the minds of the workers, says Mr. Uchimura. One great cause of the lack of real influence exercised by Christians is the spirit of compromise that is abroad, the "give and take" policy vis-à-vis the outside world. A Christian will say to a man of the world, "I will teach you English, and as a return for that, do you yield your heart up to me." This is trading, but there is no religion in it. The Christianity that we need is that which comes with an authoritative message and never dreams of proposing terms in order to ensure acceptance. The professing disciples of Christ do not realise that they have to transform the world, but not to conform to it, that they must fight a life battle with the world, the flesh, and the Devil, and not yield an inch. The spirit that knows no defeat is what needs cultivating. Rather than with Byron expend all our energy in a temporary fit of zeal on behalf of a body of men who are fighting for independence, we should with Wordsworth live among nature's beauties and amid quiet rural scenes deepen our convictions and solemnise our thoughts.

Mr. Miyoshi Taizō has published an article in the Kirisutokyō Shimbun entitled Tsuyoki wo kujiki, yowaki wo tasukubeshi. "The strong must be crushed and the weak helped," and another in a periodical called the Fujin Shimpō on the "Rights of Women" in both of which he writes earnestly on the oppressed condition and absolute slavery of women in Japan, of the insults they are called on to bear with no hope of redress. He relates that while he (Mr. Miyoshi) was in Berlin a man was fined 15 marks by the police for kissing a woman in the street, and that when he appealed to a Higher Court the fine was increased to 30 marks, on the ground that women's right to walk the streets at all times, even after dark, without molestation must be maintained by Courts of Justice at all costs.

What a contrast is this to what we see and hear in Japan, says Mr. Miyoshi, where even jinrikisha coolies think they are at liberty to make insulting remarks to the girls they are driving or to women passing by.

No. 74 of Dr. Katō's Hundred Short Essays compares the effects of Buddhism and Confucianism on the minds and lives of devotees. Buddhism is a religion whose chief interest is the next world, Confucianism a creed exclusively devoted to the affairs of this life. Both religions aim at making men more benevolent and more upright, and hence may both be pronounced good. But if asked which of the two religions is best suited to teach a man how to combine egoism with altruism so as not to do violence to either, I unhesitatingly reply, "Confucianism." The undue exaltation of the future, which is a characteristic of Buddhism, necessarily implies indifference to the present. Hence the invariable attitude of the devout Buddhist to this world and its concerns is that of the pessimist. Even the virtues of the five relationships of life occupy in the Buddhist scheme a very subordinate position. Confucianism utterly ignores the spirit world. Neither the future nor the past intimately concern us, according to this creed. All our thought is to be concentrated on the present. How we are to govern ourselves and govern others; how society may be benefited, how harmony between different classes of man may be established, how happiness is to be attained and men's chief interests promoted—these are the vital questions it discusses. Now the effect of a creed like this on men's minds is far healthier than that of the Buddhist or any other religion that exalts the future at the expense of the present. Christianity differs little from Buddhism in the prominence which it gives to the concerns of the soul and to the preparation for a future life. There are those who say that Christianity is optimistic and Buddhism pessimistic, but in reality they are both pessimistic, in that they both dwell on the inferiority and insignificance of the present life and its many concerns. It is for this reason that I have no hesitation in saying that as a working creed Confucianism is superior to both Christianity and Buddhism. Whatever the followers of Christ and

† A famous highwayman, who like our English "minions of the moon," stole from the rich and fed the poor, whose robbery is extenuated by applying the term 義賊 Gisoku, "just robbery" to it. This hero still has many admirers, as may be seen by the number who worship regularly at his tomb.

Shaka may say in opposition to the views I have expressed, the characteristic of their teaching to which I have drawn attention cannot be gainsaid.

The Shinseiki has a number of solid articles from the pens of the Reverends Kosaki, Ibuka, Motoda, Uemura, Japanese and others. It is stated that the sum subscribed to the Dōshisha by the American Board was 346,910 yen, and that an application for the refunding of the whole amount has already been sent to the Trustees by the American Board, and that the services of a former American Consul-General in Yokohama, who is now practising as a barrister, have been engaged to represent the Board at the Japanese Court at which the case will be tried. The Shinseiki regrets that the Trustees should have allowed things to come to this pass, and thinks that unless they now act promptly the very existence of the Dōshisha will be imperilled, for the trial will certainly bring no small amount of obloquy on the men into whose hands its destinies have been committed.

The Tōyōtetsugaku thinks a great deal of undiscerning criticism and claptrap are written and spoken in reference to the amount of Christian energy and spirit prevalent in Japan. It is difficult to know what is expected by the many fault-finders who undertake to pen lamentations over the present state of affairs, says this organ. It is of course perfectly true that Christianity cannot be said to have prospered in Japan as it has in some other countries. But the charge that there is no spirit in Japanese Christianity is not true. Take the history of the founding of Christian Churches in this country. You will find that numerous have been the men and the women who have givea their lives unreservedly to the cause. The cases of devotion that can be quoted from the annals of the Christian Church in Japan are equal to those given in the brightest records of Occidental Christendom. The early Christians here willingly gave up their bodies to the swordsman, were willing to have their names cast out as a byword, to be hated of all men for Christ's sake. Thus was the Christian church founded in Japan, and in the same spirit has it been built up stone by stone. Owing to the free use made of money by the missionaries, unscrupulous adventurers have entered the church, but there has been nothing like the general corruption common among Buddhists. There are many things connected with the Christian church of which I do not approve, says the writer in the Tōyōtetsugaku, but as regards spirit and energy Japanese Christians will bear comparison with any body of religious devotees that can be named. The present quiet unassuming attitude of Christianity in Japan may be attributed to a variety of causes, one of which is the conflict that is going on between educationists and Christians and another the value placed on real work as compared to mere talking by earnest Christians. One of the principal charges against modern Christians in Japan is that their teaching is anti-national in tendency—an utterly absurd accusation, since the Japanese are not a people to tamely submit to the alienation of their minds from national interests and concerns. Christians can afford to treat such charges with silent contempt. They are quite impossible assumptions. The conclusion I have come to is that the inactivity of which Christians are accused is something very different from the mid-day slumbers of the Buddhist priest who has retired to his temple. Without stir or ostentation Christians are doing the work they have set themselves to do.

The Shinseiki says that it is constantly remarked by literary men that, considering the number of its adherents, Japanese Christianity makes no small stir in the literary world. Christians seem to realise that "the pen is mightier than the sword." There were last November, observes the Shinseiki, no fewer than 39 Christian periodicals in circulation. Some of these are of course very insignificant and have a limited circulation, but, leaving these out of account, there still remains a large number of well-edited serials. Then if the number of Christian writers who contribute to secular magazines and newspapers be considered, it will be seen that Christian literary activity is a force that is accomplishing a vast deal in the way of enlightening public opinion as to the real teaching of the creed. It was proposed at the Hayama Summer School opened a short time ago to form an Association of Christian writers. This is an excellent idea and would doubtless yield great results, observes the Shinseiki. We (the editor of Shinseiki) while in America were struck with the prominence of the Roman Catholics of New York as compared with Protestants. We subsequently learnt that the Roman Catholics combine and supply the newspapers with articles and comments embodying their views. United effort of this kind among Protestant Christians in Japan might effect a great deal.

L'Abbé Francois Ligneul has published a work in Japanese entitled Kyōkai no Kenri Shugi to Jiyu Shugi, "The principle of Church rights and authority and the principle of liberty," which the Shinseiki describes as full of fusty dogmatism and abuse of Protestants and Greek Church Christians. In this work the Roman Catholics alone are represented as the true successors of Saint Peter and all other Christians are described as rebels and robbers (賊 zoku). It is amusing to find it argued that Japanese nationalism and Roman Catholicism have great affinity to each other and that at the present juncture the Catholic form of belief is the only one that is suitable to Japan's needs. There is little doubt that the book is quite 30 years behind time as far as Japan is concerned, says the Shinseiki reviewer, but still one cannot but admire the author's faithfulness to the creed which he professes.

A FEARFUL VOYAGE.

The British barque Heathfield, which put into Yokohama on Monday afternoon, had a rough experience. While on a voyage from Shanghai to Tacoma she was caught in the typhoon about 80 miles off the Japanese coast. Her sails were blown away, the stanchions of her hold broke, and the ballast shifted. The crew were set to work to put this right, but in trying to do so, through a heavy lurch to starboard, the mate (Mr. Grant) and a seaman were buried above the waist in ballast. They fortunately escaped serious injury, but it took some time to dig them out, and meanwhile every hand was badly wanted on deck. Some of the ship's boats were washed away, and she lay for a long time in the trough of the sea with her main yard buried in water and frequently seas washed over her topsail yard arms. Fortunately the gale moderated, or the barque would probably have been lost. When the weather cleared all hands were set to trim ballast, and to pump out the large quantities of water which had got into the starboard bilge. The voyage into Yokohama was made with difficulty, as the steering gear had suffered badly. The bad weather lasted altogether some four days, and the Captain, Mr. McKenzie, has seldom in a long experience seen such heavy seas. He was accompanied by his daughter.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

One of the sentiments of the time is a feeling of discontent because the Imperial University does not take a more prominent part in the questions that occupy the nation's attention. The complaint would be intelligible were it directed against the faculty of the University and its professors and instructors, for, on the whole, it is perhaps true that the contributions made by these learned men to the solution of financial, political, social and religious problems are not in proportion to their educational equipment or intellectual endowment. The Teikoku Daigaku does not occupy in Japan such a place as Oxford or Cambridge occupies in England. But it does not appear to be in that sense that the Mainichi Shimbun, for example, criticises the University. Our contemporary's remarks seem to be directed rather against the students, for it charges them with having only one aim in life, that of becoming officials; declares that whereas they are all supposed to be specialists, they never give the nation the benefit of their special knowledge; calls the University a place for educating followers of the Clan Statesmen, and urges the students to come out of their shells and make appropriate contributions to the discussion of the burning questions of the time, now that the regulations by which their tongues were tied have been rescinded.

The same subject is treated by the Jiji Shimpo, but in a different fashion. Its arguments are directed to proving that the University ought to be placed on an independent basis. Learning, it says, should be entirely beyond the range of vulgar influences, and scholars should have no concern with ranks or titles. That principle has been persistently violated in Japan. The Government has made learning a political weapon. Graduates of the University have been eligible, without examination, for the highest administrative posts, and to students of officially recognised schools there have been granted valuable privileges which are denied to students in private schools. The result is that the young men educated in public schools and colleges have developed a parasitical, office-seeking spirit, and intellectual progress has been seriously checked. But the people no longer stand in need of official protection. They resent rather than desire it. The growth of genuine learning was never an object with the Clan Government. It consulted its own convenience in directing the course of education. Thus, when the voices of liberty and progress began to be embarrassingly loud in 1880, the Confucian philosophy was once more introduced into the Schools. Then, a few years later, the Clan Statesmen went to the waters of the Rhine in search of the elixir of life, and borrowed everything from Germany to the exclusion of everything English or American. Learning, in short, became the slave of officialdom, and scholars were nothing more than aspirants for office. To establish the independence of education is the pressing need of the time. The first step should be to make the University independent of State aid. Organize a University Council and let it appoint the President. Abolish the official ranks of the Professors. Endow the institution once for all, and leave it thereafter to take care of itself. The trouble is, however, that the University folks do not want to be independent. They are like a bird that has passed its life in a cage: when it is set free, it flies back to its prison.

There has not been any evidence, visible to outsiders, that the present Cabinet is disposed to shelter itself under the ægis of the Throne, but the Jiji Shimpo obviously detects some such disposition, unless, indeed, an article in one of its recent issues be entirely meaningless. It demands that Ministerial responsibility should be placed beyond the reach of doubt. Hitherto, the custom of Cabinets has been to hold themselves directly responsible to the Sovereign and indirectly responsible to the people. On the other hand, an idea now prevails that since party government has been established, the Cabinet has no longer any responsibility to the Emperor and must hold itself answerable to the people only. That is a total misconception. Responsibility to the Throne exists beyond all question. But there must be no hiding under the Emperor's sleeve, no seeking to employ the Imperial shield for averting the shafts of public criticism from the consequences of administrative acts. We really do not know what the article means. It is sound doctrine but pointless. The finale is a weak reference to the now celebrated speech of Mr. Ozaki Yukio. Readers of the Jiji are informed that his words were blameless, since he spoke of a Japanese republic by way of illustration only, yet, at the same time, Mr. Ozaki is censured for want of caution!

Perhaps we may bracket with the above utterance of the Jiji an article in the Kokumin which attacks military folk for being too masterful and proud. Since the war, everyone has treated the men of the Army and Navy with special courtesy and deference, and they, in return, should display similar politeness and consideration. But they do not. That is practically the gist of the Kokumin's writing. We have never before heard such a charge preferred against soldiers and sailors in this country. Apparently it is a general homily hung on a particular peg, namely, the violent behaviour of Major-General Nagayama during Mr. Kudo Kokan's speech in Sapporo. The Kokumin, while blaming the General, admits that Mr. Kudo forget himself, an admission not easy to reconcile with the previous assertion that the fault of discourtesy is all on the military side. The truth is that where a sermon has always to be preached journalistically, however slight the text, the preacher's utterances are apt to become a little thin.

Mr. Oishi, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, said in a recent speech that the key to the Far-Eastern Question was in the Nearer East; in other words, so long as Europe's attention could be kept fixed upon Turkey, there would be peace and quiet in the Orient. He therefore suggested the advisability of endeavouring to shift the venue to Turkey, and as a means to that end he advised the conclusion of a Treaty with Turkey, and the despatch of a clever diplomat thither as well as to the Balkan Peninsula. Naruhodo! says the Yomiuri Shimbun. Certainly it is true that when a storm prevails in Turkey the Far East enjoys a calm; but how are those atmospheric conditions to be produced at will? To make a treaty with Turkey and send a Minister to Constantinople are not the kind of steps that one necessarily associates with a re-opening of the ancient "Eastern Question." The Red Sea seems to be nearer to the centre of probable commotion. Conclude a treaty with Turkey by all means, but let Cairo, not Constantinople, be the place for a Japanese legation.

There are some subjects so unsavoury that we hesitate to touch upon them in these columns, yet to pass them over in silence would be to hide from our readers a part of the working of Japanese contemporary thought, which it is the object of our weekly and monthly summaries to expose. That must be our justification and our apology. Chikusho is a word familiar to many—too many—foreign residents. They have often used it to the offending or unoffending coolie. But Chikushō is probably new to them. It means to keep a mistress. Japan's one "Yellow journal," the Yorozu Choho, has lately been drawing much attention to this immoral custom in a thoroughly immoral manner. The Mainichi Shimbun is moved thereby to take up its parable. Very often the writings of this Mainichi Shimbun are palpably permeated by a Christian spirit and a Christian style, but sometimes it shows almost fanatical narrowness of creed. In this case it declares that the plan pursued by the Yorozu Choho—namely, the publication of the names of the Corinthians in Tokyo—is an obvious waste of time. The economical and sensible method would be to publish the names of men that lead clean lives, for 80 or 90 per cent. belong to the soiled schedule. Yet the Mainichi thinks that this evil record is due not to the promptings of the flesh so much as to the dictates of vanity. To be the proprietor of that particular kind of pretty chattel is to posses a sign board advertising to the world one's well filled purse. The lists paraded in the columns of the Yorozu Choho only pander to the depraved pride of those whose names appear there. It would be better to tell the public something about the results of such indulgence—wasted lives, dissipated fortunes, domestic misery, fruitless repentance. Would not that be the true medicine to cure the disease? Two other recommendations are made by the Mainichi, and it is in the second of them that we detect the narrowness spoken of above. The first is that, instead of agitating against the keeping of concubines, a habit which will gradually be corrected, every effort should be directed to abolishing licensed prostitution; the second, that children born out of wedlock should bear the perpetual stigma of their birth; should be excluded from schools where legitimate children are taught, and should be made to carry through life a disabling burden of disgrace. A more appallingly cruel and unreflecting proposition was never advanced, we think.

There has been a decided change of journalistic opinion about the Czar's peace proposals. When we wrote our last summary, the vernacular papers, with the solitary exception of the Mainichi Shimbun, were disposed to ridicule the incident and treat it as piece of trickery. They could not understand what it meant, but they had a kind of timeo-Danaos instinct about it. The Nippon especially distinguished itself by its bitter sarcasm. Yet the same Nippon now deprecates any light treatment of such a proposal, and as for the Hochi, it adopts the Biblical phraseology of the Mainichi and calls the Russian Emperor's announcement "a blessing" (fuku-in). The Sovereign of Japan, adds the Hochi, will certainly sympathise heartily with the idea.

It is confidently asserted that the office-hunting fever has again broken out with wasting heat. The malady was responsible, say the critics, for all the difficulties that beset the Cabinet at the beginning of its career. After the general elections, there was a fall of temperature, but now, unhappily, the thermometer stands again at 40°. This diagnosis is based on the anxiety shown by party politicians to bring about a radical modification, if not the total repeal, of the Regulations for Official Appointments. There are said to be no less than 3 000 applicants for office—according to the Nippon—and unless the qualifications for appointment be greatly reduced, no means of satisfying this hungry crowd can be found. It is all very well to doctor the fever, says the Nippon, but the cure must not be of such a nature as to hurt the whole country. A Cabinet which sacrifices the interests of the nation to the appetite of its political partizans, illustrates the evil of party government, not the good. The Nippon has always been hostile to the present Ministry, so its statements must be taken with all reserve. But the Yomiuri Shimbun (Progressist organ) is equally emphatic and more precise. It uncompromisingly condemns the idea of changing the Regulations for Official Appointments, and urges that the examination system should be extended so as to embrace special subjects. It would even have the private secretaries of Ministers pass an examination before being admitted to office, and it would abolish the provision sanctioning the nomination of University graduates without examination. It is reassuring to find that one of the Constitutional Party's organs has the courage to raise its voice against the unhappily retrogressive step contemplated by a majority of the Kensei-to.

JAPANESE FACTS AND COMMENTS.

The financial administration of Japan, remarks the Yomiuri, is now in a state of serious disorganisation. The Matsukata Cabinet fell on this account, and its immediate successor—the Ito Ministry—also incurred the same fate, and a similar catastrophe threatens the new Constitutional Administration. Some critics urge that the financial embarrassment is due to an expansion of armaments disproportionate to the national strength, and that so long as the armaments' expansion programme is not curtailed the adjustment of the finances is a matter of impossibility. They say that the question of increased taxation is of secondary importance. Those who are opposed to these views contend that the scheme for the expansion of armaments can not possibly be reduced, but ought to be pushed forward even at the expense of increased taxation. To ascertain the cause for financial distress and then find the means of redress—these are two important problems which require immediate solution. The Yomiuri thinks the increase of national taxation is the only hope, and it recommends a singular programme. In the first place it makes allusion to Switzerland, where a net profit of 42,326,244 francs is realized by inns and hotels. The Yomiuri thinks some use should be made of the beauties of nature in Japan; that is to say, that steps should be taken to induce millionaires and tourists to empty their purses in exploiting the lovely scenery of the Japanese mountains and sea-coasts. If the Alps and Lake Como attract so many visitors why should not Mount Fuji and Lake Biwa? But the sanguine Yomiuri forgets that one can get from London to Basel in less than 24 hours, while Japan is a month's journey.

The Nichi Nichi publishes a note on the scheme of naval construction now undertaken by Russia. On the authority of the l'Italie, a French journal published in Rome, our contemporary alleges that Russia has sent orders to Messrs. Jo Anthard & Co., Genoa, for the construction of a huge war-vessel 130 metres in length, provided with six boilers and four funnels. In addition, Russia is reported to have entrusted the Company with the repair and reconstruction of a number of other vessels.

The budgets for the 32nd year, submitted to the Cabinet by the Minister of Finance, were discussed on the 7th instant, when the estimates of the various Departments were settled as proposed by the Finance Minister. A strong protest was made in regard to the new claims advanced by the War, Navy, Communications, and Education Departments, and to a portion of the outlays to be made in advance for the settlement of accounts in connection with the public bonds and Indemnity. Further discussion on these points was left to another Cabinet conference.

A politician—one of those convenient creations of Japanese journalists—remarks in the columns of the Nippon that the Liberals and Progressists now forming the Constitutional Party are as hostile to each others as dogs and monkeys. Every question affecting the State is a source of strife between the two parties, but the greater influence seems to rest with the Progressists. The Liberals, in view of these circumstances, have begun to devote their energies to securing the assistance of a section of the Clan statesmen. They have in vain attempted to bring Baron Ito into the Cabinet, and have even tried to secure a portfolio for Mr. Hoshi, by recourse to the assistance of the Minister of the Imperial Household, the military circles, and the brokers in the share market. The writer attributes dark and sinister designs to Marquis Yamagata and Count Inouye who, he alleges, are now in Tokyo meditating a plan of campaign against the Cabinet. Moreover, a number of politicians under the leadership of Viscount Takashima are busy with secret conferences, while the Kwanto clique, headed by Mr. Hoshi, is ready to rise at a moment's notice. One thing is certain, and that is the formation of a Coalition Cabinet of Liberals and Clan statesmen.

Investigations as to the prices of commodities in the leading cities and towns throughout the Empire have been made independently by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, the Finance Department, and the Nippon Ginko. The results are as follow:—

Year.	Result of investigations by Agr. and Com. Depart.	The same by Finance Dep't.	The same by Nippon Ginko.
1887...	100	100	100
1888...	102	100	104
1889...	111	96	109
1890...	116	111	114
1891...	111	106	106
1892...	114	107	112
1893...	121	104	116
1894...	134	111	122
1895...	142	118	131
1896...	159	130	141
1897...	—	—	161

In making the above calculations the Department of Agriculture and Commerce has taken the average of 36 commodities, the Finance Department that of 15, and the Nippon Ginko that of 43. That prices have risen considerably during the past ten years is an undeniable fact, but it is curious to observe the considerable differences in the estimates. Comparing the figures for 1896 with those for 1887, it may be noticed that, whereas the Finance Department shows the enhancement in prices to have been only 30 per cent., and the Bank of Japan indicates it to have been 41 per cent, the Agricultural and Commercial Department places it at almost 60 per cent. On the whole, the appreciation in the provincial cities and towns seems to have been greater than in Tokyo.

A Formosan Notification published in the Official Gazette indicates the establishment of a school where common and technical education is imparted to women. The course of general study is to extend over six years, and the term fixed for the technical course is three years only. The students for the general course must be above 8 and below 14 years of age; those for the technical course above 14 and below 25. The principal technical subjects are tailoring, embroidery, flower manufacture, drawing, and various branches of art.

Not many years have elapsed since Japanese flour manufactured in Hokkaido was first exported abroad. The chief market, according to the Mainichi, was Vladivostock, and last year 25 495 piculs were exported from Hakodate and Otaru. The latest investigations show the number of factories to be nine, producing in all 1 348,750 lbs. valued at 46,650 yen.

The following is a list of railway companies which have decided on issuing debentures:—

Railways	Gross amount of debentures. yen.	Sale price, per 100 yen, fair value. yen.	Interest. Per cent.
Hantan ...	360,000	95	10
Tojokawa.	100,000	100	12
Chuyetsu.	150,000	95	12
Koya	800 000	—	10
Chugoku .	600,000	—	—
Kishin ...	1,000 000	—	—

It is a striking commentary on the present financial situation to find such a high rate of interest as 12 per cent offered on railway debentures. Any undertakings which are not of immediate necessity should be suspended or postponed. By taking the above measures the necessity for the introduction of foreign capital is avoided; if it should become necessary to appeal to the shareholders for funds in connection with some unavoidable expenditure, the amount can be reduced to the lowest possible figure. Another vernacular paper has something to say about the changes contemplated by the Nippon Railway Company. It asserts that the personnel of the company will be reduced to one-third of the present number, and that the salaries of the highest officials will be reduced, from 3 000 yen, to 2,000 yen, those of second class officials from 2,100 yen to 1,800 yen, and those of the third class officials from 1,200 to 1,000 yen. Then the expenditures in the workshops at Omiya and Morioka are to be transferred to special accounts. The present one Department and seven Sections are to be entirely abolished, and two new Departments to be designated Eigyobu and Hommubu respectively are to be substituted. The former, or Business Department, will consist of three Sections—Transport, Carriages, and Preservation of Lines; the latter, or Main Affairs Department, will include the two Sections of Warehouses and Accounts. In addition to the above changes, the abolition of the Department of Construction is also under contemplation, Chief Inspectors and Auditors are not to have mere sinecures, and the sale of useless stores out of the quantities now in the godowns to the value of 3 million yen, is to be carried out.

The inauguration of Viscount Soga as President of the Nippon Railway Company has, says a Japanese paper, led to radical measures being taken for the reform of gross abuses now besetting the institution. As a preliminary, a reform committee of five was appointed on the 19th ultimo at a special meeting of the principal officials. The investigations with which they were entrusted were speedily completed, the result being reported to a meeting of officials on the 2nd instant. The first step in the direction of reform is said to be the immediate dismissal of three influential Directors—Mr. Adachi Taro, of the Section of Transport, Mr. Suirasugi Seiai, of the Section of Accounts and Warehouses, and Mr. Uchida Naozo, of the Section of Miscellaneous Affairs—and the substitution of Messrs. Kubo Fuso, Kobe Kiochi, and Yamada Eitaro. There will be other sweeping changes in the personnel. The programme of reform is as follows:—(1) The general expenses of the Company will be decreased by the dismissal of useless employes, and a reduction in other outlays in the interests of the shareholders. (2) A negative policy will be adopted in regard to the extension of business and the inauguration of special enterprises.

The Tokyo Asahi is surprised at the rapid increase in the number of prisoners in Taipeh, Formosa. Statistics recently compiled by the Government show that the number in January last year was only 284, whereas it had increased in July this year to 787. The monthly average of new prisoners is 177, and the average number of released does not exceed 81. This means at increase of 33 per mensem. The number of prisoners in August was 803, of whom about 33 per cent were detained for armed robbery—an offence which is only expiated by several years detention.

According to the Tokyo Asahi, a special meeting of prison superintendents is to be held at the Home Department, when the following problems will be introduced for discussion:—(1.) The Home Minister's instructions in regard to the treatment of foreign criminals. (2.) Methods of training prison Inspectors. (3.) Moral lectures to prisoners. (4) Legitimate functions of warders. (5) Method of dealing with prisoners in separate cells. (6.) The selection of criminals for this treatment. (7.) Inauguration of prison assembly. (8) Surveillance of convicts released from imprisonment. (9.) Method of dealing with unconvicted prisoners charged with criminal offences. (10.) Preparation of prison statistics. (11.) Treatment of criminal lunatics. (12.) Moral instruction to foreign convicts. (13.) Food for foreign criminals and other important topics in connection with the adjustment of prison affairs. Those references to "moral lectures" and "moral instruction" show a delightful faith in the perfectibility of the species.

"AN ANNIVERSARY EXHIBITION."

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—In a recent issue you referred to the year 1899 as "the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of modern Japan to foreign intercourse and to a proposition to celebrate it by holding an exhibition in Tokyo. Now, if my memory serves me correctly, it was only forty-five years ago (1853), when Commodore Perry made his first visit to Japan; and it was just forty years ago (1858), when Townsend Harris, U.S. Minister to Japan, negotiated the first commercial treaty with this Empire. There is evidently a mistake somewhere. Of course, the year 1859 was one in which some foreign treaties were negotiated; so that it may be the fortieth anniversary which is to be celebrated. Nor will 1902 be the fiftieth anniversary, as stated in some papers, except by a false method of reckoning. The only proper time for that celebration is, of course, in 1903.

Your respectfully,

ERNEST W. CLEMENT.

Tokyo, Sept. 5.

[The statement to which our correspondent refers was taken from a Japanese paper, and has since been corrected by us. As for 1902, it will be the fiftieth year according to Japanese reckoning. Mr. Clement, who is well versed in things Japanese, need scarcely be reminded that 1854 is the second year from 1853, by Japanese arithmetic.—Ed. J.M.]

TOKYO-YOKOHAMA EXPESS TRAINS.

Sir,—I like those fast trains which run twice daily each way between Tokyo and Yokohama without stopping. They must be so convenient for busy people who can't afford to spend much time in travelling, as they are scheduled to make the trip in 38 minutes. I have just come down from Tokyo on one of those trains. It left Shimbashi at 9 o'clock, and reached the signal station in the Yokohama yards at 9.28. It was very delightful to sit proudly in one's seat as the train sped past Shinagawa, Omori, Kawasaki, Tsurumi and Kanagawa, and to anticipte breaking the record by making Yokohama station in 30 minutes. But unfortunately we were stopped at the signal-station to wait for the train which had left Shimbashi at 8.30 to go on her way westward. And she too was waiting for the train, due from Numazu at 9 28, to get in. The latter finally arrived, rather late, so that we were able to get away from the signal station after waiting 30 minutes, and reached Yokohama station at 10 o'clock, just one hour from Tokyo by fast express! Better half a dozen stops at way stations than half an hour of waiting in the Yokohama yards so near and yet so far from the station. I repeat that I appreciate those express trains as time-savers!

Yours respectfully, TRAVELLER.

TO ELTEKON.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—The Editor of the Shepherd's Voice appreciates the kindly attempt of "Eltekon" to awaken our conscience to the impropriety of our name. However, it is not pleasant (as in your issue of the 8th) to be classed with Judas Iscariot and the Doshisha Trustees, and to be charged with obtuseness of the sense of pious propriety. Were we to retaliate we might say that such criticisms as "Eltekon's" have almost invariably emanated from sectarians guilty of the violation of some plain Scripture. We venture to say that "Eltekon" is a sectarian, a member of some denomination not heard of in the Bible. We are glad to say that our writing at the head of the only undenominational magazine in Japan the name Shepherd's Voice, and our efforts to teach and follow that Voice, and induce others to do the same, meet with the sincerest approval of minds as pious as any brought up in denominations utterly unknown to that Voice which spake as never man spake. We would be glad to send "Eltekon" the Shepherd's Voice if we knew his habitation.

We thank you, Mr. Editor, for so much space in replying to this question, which under proper conditions might be made profitable.

Very truly,

Ed. "THE SHEPHERD'S VOICE."

AN APPEAL.

Sir,—Will you very kindly allow me to appeal to the public through the columns of the Japan Mail on behalf of those Ainus who have lately been brought to great want and distress through the recent floods in Hokkaido. The rains have been exceptionally heavy in some parts of the Island this summer, and the rivers in some districts have overflowed and done very much damage. The garden produce of no less than eighty Ainu families in one district has been completely washed away and the people brought to the last extremity. Unless something is done to help these poor sufferers there will be nothing left for it this winter but starvation or crime, I fear. After careful inquiries I estimate that in one district alone there are 480 persons who are absolutely destitute and require assistance. The help to be given will consist in food for the present and seeds for planting in the spring. Besides those in immediate and absolute want, there are hundreds of others who have suffered, some more, some less, by the floods. These latter, however, will not require help to anything like the same extent as the former. Will not some of your many charitably disposed readers kindly stretch out a helping hand at this time of need to these poor sufferers? Any contributions entrusted to me shall be faithfully expended, and if any contributor of five yen will kindly forward me his or her name and address I will gladly, if he wishes, send in return five Ainu photographs taken by myself, or in the case of ten yen, ten photos shall be sent.

Thanking you in advance for your courtesy, and earnestly hoping that help will be forthcoming.

I am, your sincerely,

JNO. BATCHELOR.

"SHADOWS WE PURSUE."

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—An editorial article in to-day's Mail, dealing with a contemplated international exhibition "to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of Japan," strenuously denounces the idea of commemorating Commodore Perry's coming and endeavours to demonstrate that this coming, instead of being "a fitting cause for national rejoicing," was in fact "a national humiliation," equivalent to "a dose of very nasty medicine." This having been made clear, from the Mail's point of view, by a line of emphatic assevera tions, we find the following naïve question and answer:—"After all, has there been any talk of a great national fête to commemorate Perry's advent? We have not heard it." Well, it no suggestion of the kind has been advanced, and if the Mail has not heard of one, it may be within the limits of pardonable curiosity to inquire why it is deemed necessary to take up arms against it, to the extent of nearly half a column of vehement argument. To employ so much rhetorical energy in condemning a proposition, and then to announce that the proposition has never been heard of, seems as complete a non sequitur as can be imagined.

I am, Sir, Yours truly, E H H.

Yokohama, Sept. 13th.

(Surely there is not the smallest obscurity. Certain persons object to the exhibition project as a celebration of Perry's coming. We quote their objections and comment on them. At the same time we remind the objectors that the projectors of the exhibition did not say anything about Perry; they spoke merely of celebrating the opening of the country. "E.H.H." will further perceive, if he refers again to the paragraph, that most of the objections set forth there are not ours, but merely taken from the Nippon and other sources. The "half column of vehement argument" contains just eight lines of our contribution to the discussion.—Ed J.M.)

MR. OGAWA ON PRISONS.

In a recent issue of the Kokkagakkwai Zasshi, Mr. Ogawa Shigejiro, who is the greatest expert on prisons in Japan, discusses the improvement of Japanese jails. In Europe and America, he says, the necessity of the improvement of prisons has already been recognized by the public, and much money and labour have been expended by governments for carrying out new scientific opinions concerning the building of prisons and the mode of treatment of prisoners. But the decrease of offenders, the chief object of prison improvement, has not yet been attained. On the contrary, offences increase year after year according to the progress of society. The latest German criminal statistics show that the total number of crimes and misdemeanours in Germany was 329,000 in 1882, but increased to 430,000 cases in 1893, and still further increased to 446,000 in the next year 1894. Population during this period increased by 13 per cent, while crimes increased by 35 per cent. The same increase is traceable throughout the Continent of Europe. Thus people are beginning to doubt the efficacy of the present system of prisons, and an impetuous class of Italian thinkers are crying out for a wholesale revolution and the substitution of such punishments as hanging, whipping, or transportation for imprisonment. Nay, even thoughtful scholars are considering whether the increase of offenders is owing to the imperfect progress of prison improvement or to a fundamental error in the system. Mr. Ogawa, however, firmly believes that the policy of prison improvement is just and proper; it is the right means to its end, the prevention of crime. Why, then, do statistics show an increase of offences instead of a decrease? It is because the progress of society increases the various social factors which are the cause of offences, and which consequently multiply the cases of offence. If prison improvement in European States had not been carried out as it has been, the increase of offences must have been far more. The case of England is striking because it shows, contrary to the experience of the Continent, a decrease of offences, notwithstanding the great increase in her population. There were 11,710 persons punished with penal servitude or imprisonment in 1871, but only 8,504 in 1891. The statistics of infant criminality show a striking decrease; 10 314 offenders in 1836 had shrunk to 3,855 in 1891. The most noticeable point in the case of England is a decrease of criminals and of prison expenses after the year 1877, in which the scheme of prison improvement and the disbursement of prison expenses from the Treasury were inaugurated. Despite the extraordinary outlay on account of new edifices, rebuilding, etc., disbursed during the seven years from 1878 to 1884, the expenses of the prison system during these years show, as compared with the years from 1870 to 1877, a decrease of above £500,000; while the 20,442 prisoners in 1878 had shrunk to 14,966 prisoners in 1887. During this period, too, the increase of population was over 4,500,000 persons.

To take the example of Japan, where the improvement of prisons is only in a nascent state, there were 43,000 accused persons in the houses of detention in 1882, and 78,000 in 1894. From this last example it is clear that the comparatively small increase of offences in Continental Europe, where the struggle for life is very keen, must entirely be attributed to the effect of the improvement of prisons on the continent. Thus it may be concluded that the improvement of prisons is the right and proper method. Mr. Ogawa, after stating the so-called social factors which are the causes of offences, and adding a brief statement of the new régime in European prisons, says at the end of the essay that the condition of Japanese prisons shows an immature state of improvement, and points out that much has to be done in the future beyond what is merely necessary as preparation for the revised treaties.

Apropos of this, the remarks of Mr. Ogawa on the Draft of the Revised Japanese Penal Code (which, though not submitted in the last session of the Imperial Diet, will appear before the Diet sooner or later), published in another number of the same magazine, may be interesting to our readers. He says, referring to the revision of the Penal Code:—It is one of the marked reforms of the Draft Penal Code that the varieties of punishments prescribed in it are much fewer than those in the present Penal Code. Still it is desirable to go a step further, and to exclude the distinction of choyeki (penal servitude) and kinko (imprisonment) maintained in the Draft Penal Code, and restrict the punishment as regards detention to one class i.e. imprisonment. The Draft Code provides the infliction of choyeki for crimes of a depraved nature, and kinko for the others, the difference in these two punishments being that in one hard labour is inflicted and in the other it is not. Such a distinction can not, however, be actually realized, because according to the provisions of the Draft Code, and conformably to general experience up to the present, the number of the criminals punishable with kinko (imprisonment) will not be numerous, and no special prison could be established for them. They should be treated in every point just in the same way as the criminals sentenced to choyeki (penal servitude). Moreover, the distinction is against the practice and theory of punishments in prisons. The persons sentenced to kinko, at least ninety out of every hundred of them, will, though they are not punished in the Draft Code with hard labour, ask for labour, and such work, after their application is permitted, must be strictly carried out for settled hours almost in the same manner as the work of the convicts punished with penal servitude. That is necessary for preserving order in prisons. Of course there will be some convicts who with not ask for labour. But such the prison authorities must urge and encourage to work for the sake of their health, their good behaviour, and the possibility of making a living after the expiry fo their sentence. There is no doubt that ninety-nine out of a hundred convicts will take to work, and the distinctions referred to in the Code will be broken down. Besides, it is a great and ignorant blunder of legislators to have chosen laborious work as a means of correction for crimes of a corrupt nature, Labour is holy, and ought not to be despised. Its enjoyment is man's natural right as well as duty. In olden days this truth was ignored, and labour was despised. But now, though penal laws of various nations still provide laborious work as a means of punishment, it has become recognized generally that labour should be encouraged in prison for the health and good conduct of convicts, as well as for giving them means of living after their exit from jail. Nay, convicts are sometimes punished in prison by depriving them of their right of working. For these reasons it is impossible to agree with the provisions of the Draft Code which use labour as a means of punishment.

UNEARNED INCREMENT IN JAPAN.

One of Count Okuma's arguments in favour of increasing the taxes on urban lands is the great increase in their value during the Meiji period. The Count, remarks the Tokyo Keisai Zasshi, ought to take a similar view in regard to wet and dry fields and forest lands, the value of which has also risen considerably in proportion to the general progress and development of the country. In proof of these facts our contemporary adduces the following table :—

	Market value of wet fields per tan.	Ratio of market value to every 100 yen of the taxable value of the same.	Market value of dry fields per tan.	Ratio of market value to every 100 yen of the taxable value of the same

The above is the result of investigations made by the Finance Department. Are not the increases in value shown by it extraordinary? Nothing, in view of these circumstances, can be more absurd than the policy which advocates the increased taxation of urban land, but condemns the adoption of a similar resolution with respect to wet and dry fields.

Another table is published in the Keisai Zasshi, showing the reduction in the rates of land tax paid by freeholders in Japan since the commencement of the Meiji Era. This shows that the average taxation for the 5th, 6th, and 7th years was yen 49 462,945, while the amount paid in the 29th year was only yen 38.500,000, and if we add to that sum the supplementary taxes of all descriptions collected in the various cities and prefectures, the total does not exceed 45.500,000 yen. Rice, too, fetches three times the price it did formerly, and that standard appears likely to be maintained. From these facts it is clear that the landlord should be called on to contribute a larger portion of their abnormal profits to relieve the present embarrassment of the State.

THE LATE GEORGE PAUNCEFOTE.

A well-known personality passed out of the ranks of Yokohama residents on Monday morning when George Pauncefote died. The veteran had reached the ripe age of 78 years and his end came quite peacefully. He was a man with a history. In his youth a member of a stock theatrical company, he was soaked in the lore of the wearers of the sock and buskin, and many were the interesting reminiscences of provincial theatres and green-rooms and their habitués in the England of the early fifties, which he would call to mind when interested auditors pressed him to go over the tale of his youth He toured the United States with success and was in California in the sixties. From thence he drifted to Japan where he spent the remainder of his life, first at Totsuka, but later at the Shakespeare, Negishi. He was a man that won many friends, for his life, even amid humble surroundings, seemed to reflect the fine spirit of the dramas he had studied with such loving diligence.

The funeral took place on Monday evening, the mournful procession leaving the General Hospital at 5.30 o'clock. The widow, Miss Pauncefote and Mr. Pauncefote were the chief mourners, with Mr. Geo. Booth and close personal friends. Among those who followed were the Worshipful Masters of the Yokohama Lodge, No. 1092, E.C., Mr. Alf. Woolley, and the O'Tentosama Lodge, No. 1263, E.C., Mr. A. Bellamy Brown; the I.P.M. of the Star in the East, S.C., Mr. A. R. G. Clarke; Wardens, officers, and members of the various Masonic Lodges in Yokohama; Mr. R.G.E. Forster, Acting British Consul-General; Mr. C. D. Moss, Mr. F.O. Eustace, Mr. F.Townley, Rev. E. C. Irwine, M.A., Captain Harrison, and many others. Among the wreaths which covered the coffin, or were carried behind the bier by the bereaved family, were the following :—Mr. F. O. Eustace. Mr. Louis Eppinger, the Officers and members of the Yokohama Lodge ; the Master, Wardens and members of the O'Tentosama Lodge ; the Master and Officers of the Star in the East Lodge ; Mr. A. R. G. Clarke, Captain Weston, Mr. O. Keil, Mr. R. G. E. Forster, "C.L.O.," Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Booth, Messrs. Kobayashi, K. Nakazawa, K. Kobukata, T. Mizawa, Kawaguchi, T. Makita, Matsuda, Y. Yokota, S. Tanaka, H. Katsu, Kaneko Tatsugoro, Ogawa Yotaro, Kitami Tetsugoro, Suwao Tosuke, Suzuki Mosuke, Tsutsumi Sada, Kuwaibara Tokujiro, Yishikawa Zusaburo, Hattori Montaro, Tanaka Risa, Okada Genbei, Sakai Tanesaburo, Kameki Haizo, and Taki Kichigoro. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. S. Worden.

During July, Mr. C. B. Fry, of Sussex, took part in eight matches, and went to the wickets 14 times, making an average score of over 79 runs per innings.

"GIBSON" TABLEAUX.

The Public Hall was crowded to the utmost limit on Thursday evening, when an entertainment was given in aid of the funds of the Ladies' Benevolent Society. The principal portion of the programme consisted of a series of tableaux taken from the works of Gibson, the American black-and-white artist, and very successful they turned out to be. Gibson is popularly supposed to have discovered and then made perfect the ideal type of the American girl. To a lover of fine line-work his studies of the female form divine, as they appear weekly in Life, have appealed with peculiar force, for behind the mere draughtsmanship lay a great artist's peculiar motif: he has ever a story to tell, always of the sarcastic sub-acid order, which we associate with certain qualities of Transatlantic humour.

To Mr. Hubbard Smith, we believe, the community is principally indebted for last evening's amusement. He set the idea in motion and then superintended its practical execution to the end. Of course others shared the labour with him in various degrees, but they prefer to be nameless, their reward lying in the genuine fun which was distilled during the evening. The various tableaux have all been advertised, and it is needless here to go into a description of them or dilate on their varying merits. Suffice it to say that those who took part in them included the Misses Moss, Wheeler, Powell, Coppmann, Eldridge, Thomas, Poole, and Varnum; Mesdames McWilliams, Anderson, and Clark, and Messrs. Morse, Ross, Hubbard Smith, Martin, Plummer, Howard, Janion, Stuart, McWilliams, Mowrer, Leather, Langberg, and Davis, and Master Coppmann. Songs were contributed during the evening by Messrs. McChesney and Morse, and Miss Thomas, the latter's contributions being very charming. The mandoline and guitar selections by members of the band of the Marco Polo were very pleasing and received encores. The band of the Italian cruiser Marco Polo gave some capital selections in the intervals.

DEATH OF MR. HENRY HENNESSY.

Many in Yokohama, Kobe, and Nagasaki —in fact all along the line to Hongkong— will regret to learn of the death of Mr. Henry Hennessey, purser on the Doric, who had for fully thirty years been in the employ of the Pacific Mail & O. & O. Companies. Mr. Hennessy was taken sick a few weeks ago, and the steamer Doric sailed from San Francisco without him. He gradually grew worse, and the end came on Aug. 22nd from a complication of troubles culminating in Bright's disease. In his many voyages across the Pacific Mr. Hennessey gained the friendship of a large circle, both on the American coast and in the East. He was a native of New York, where he was born in 1840. His wife, Mrs. Mary Hennessey, and a daughter, Miss Minnie Hennessey, survive him. The funeral was made the occasion of a demonstration of respect on the part of San Francisco Masons, the members of the Doric Lodge attending in large numbers. The ritual of the order was observed and the music was furnished by a choir of Masons. The officers of Mr. Hennessey's old ship, the Belgic, which happened to be in port, attended the funeral service in a body. The officers of the steamship Doric sent a Maltese cross, wrought in great waxen-cupped begonias shading from snowy white to palest rose, interspersed with maiden's-hair fern, with the name of the ship written in purple immortelles on a ground of white daisies. From officers and employés of the Occidental and Oriental Steamship Company came a facsimile of the ship's flag at half-mast, the red white and blue colours meeting in diamond points in the centre, and wrought in violets, white carnations, and coral-tinted begonias.

OUR BOOK-SHELF.

Helbeck of Bannisdale, by Mrs. Humphry Ward. Macmillan's Colonial Library, London: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD has already a large circle of admirers, and that circle is, we think, likely to be extended by her last achievement in literature. Mrs. Ward is not an authoress to be taken lightly, and those frivolous persons—there are a few still, even in these days of universal intelligence, electric light, and University Extension lectures—who read a novel simply to be amused or excited, will have to go further. And they may fare worse. Mrs. Ward has advantages over the many self-appointed apostles who now-a-days preach at the public from Mudie's bookshelves. Her writing is absolutely clean, and free from the irritating mannerisms which are the modern equivalent for originality. She deals in searching analyses of character, but the dissecting knife in her hands is not so brutal a weapon as in the grip of some of her contemporaries. Her style is vigorous and elegant; she has the gift of handling a pathetic situation strongly, and, just as she can minutely analyse the sexual passion without offence, so she can deal with serious questions of religious belief and unbelief without the smallest trace of irreverence. The faint aroma of the Superior Person—once the flavour was very pronounced—still hangs about her work, but it is no longer disagreeable. "Helbeck of Bannisdale" is real literature: its leading ideas are admirably conceived, and the unfolding of the tale, and its progress towards the tragically logical conclusion, are done with an admirably dramatic instinct.

The story is simple, and derives its interest, not from any complexity of incident, but from the essential strength of the characterization. The action centres, of course, round a man and a woman—Alan Helbeck, the descendant of an ancient race of Catholic gentlemen, impoverished by persecution, isolated by Protestant bigotry, proud of their sacrifices for religion; and Laura Fountain, the daughter of a free-thinking Cambridge Professor, of plebeian origin and democratic ideas, a mind of the modern scientific cast, and a contemptuously-bitter feeling for all kinds of religion. The girl's memory of her dead father—her hero, oracle, and idol—is one of the strongest motive forces of her life. She has unconsciously absorbed his theories of the universe from the cradle. A man but little known to fame, excluded, as he thinks, by clerical party influence from prizes that should be legitimately his, his mental attitude towards the Churches is more that of militant enmity than of philosophic and contemptuous indifference.

> She felt to her heart's core that he was unsuccessful, there were prizes he should have had, but had failed to get, and it was the religious party, the "clerical crew" of Convocation, that had stood in the way. From her childhood it came natural to her to hate bigoted people who believed in ridiculous things. It was they who stood between her father and his deserts. There loomed up, as it were, on her horizon, something dim and majestic, which was called Science. Towards this her father pressed, she clinging to him, while all about them was a black and hindering crowd, through which they clove their way—contemptuously.

Besides the Professor and Laura the little Cambridge ménage includes another person—Fountain's second wife. She is no other than the elder sister of Helbeck of Bannisdale; she has married Fountain in face of her brother's sternly expressed disapproval; and she lives for years as an exile from the paternal home and a backslider from her mother Church. Her weakness of character prevents her making any active assertion of her Catholic convictions, but, though dormant, they are still powerful; and when the Professor dies—"he would not say even to comfort Laura, that they would meet again; he had not believed it, and so she must not"—Mrs. Fountain re-takes to confession, is reconciled first to the Church and then to her brother, and finally goes back to her old home in Westmoreland, to live with Helbeck again. With her goes Laura as companion and nurse—in a spirit of protest and rebellion, making two homes out which to sink.

conditions that she shall never be asked to prayers or Mass, determined to keep aloof from all the religious life of the house, and with a light contempt for the puerilities of Catholicism as she sees it. She meets Helbeck—narrow, enthusiast by nature and ascetic by habit, bigoted but noble and high-minded, his whole life and most of his means spent in what he considers his duty as lay head of Westmoreland Catholicism. The two strong natures are at once attracted and repelled by each other; but finally love holds the mastery, and they are engaged to be married. But, in all the strength of a sincere passion, the theological shadow comes between them. Helbeck is firm in his devotion to his old faith; the girl, at first petulantly jealous of something that she feels has still the first place in his heart, then genuinely anxious to become a Catholic in order that she may share his whole life, finds the influences of her youth and childhood too strong to conquer. Her very soul rebels at the restraints Catholicism places over liberty of will and judgment; in heart she despises the abjection of its devotees, she finds in the Church's saints only insane fanatics or fantastic prudes, she scorns its machine-made miracles and its manufactured relics, and by the side of all these she glories in the Liberal Tradition of her father and the elect of science. She feels how impossible, since she cannot conquer her aversion, life will be for her as the wife of a man who holds sacred what she mocks; her honesty will not allow her to be a hypocrite and lie to her conscience, even to please him. And so she leaves him. Months pass away—months of misery to both—and then Laura is called back to the deathbed of her step-mother. There she meets Helbeck once more; in the melting mood which the occasion brings about she promises again to be his wife, to give up her long conviction, and to become a Catholic. But, in her own words:—

> Something was said to me that reminded one of my father. I had forgotten him for so long. But when they left me with her (her dead step-mother) I seemed to be holding not her hand, but his. I was back in the old life—I heard him speaking quite distinctly, "Laura, you cannot do it—you cannot do it." And he looked at me with sorrow and displeasure. I argued with him so long, but he beat me down. And the voice I seemed to hear was not his only; it was the voice of my own life, only far stronger and crueller than I had ever known it. . . . Oh, my best, best beloved, cruel to open an old wound. But to live a lie—upon his heart, in his arms—that would be worse. . . . There is no other way. Because death puts an end.

And so she drowns herself and goes to her own place. And Helbeck goes to his own place—a Jesuits' college. Both characters are drawn with singular strength; one is interested and sympathetic from beginning to end, and when the last chapter is reached one feels inclined to be angry with the authoress for killing the girl and immuring the man. "If there were only some other way out! Oh the pity of it! the pity of it!"

Much of the charm of the book lies in the setting of the story among the bleak fells and honest north country men of Westmoreland, with their rough brogue and good, narrow notions. Laura's cousin Hubert, a lout redeemed by a passion for music; her aunt and the country person, with anti-Papist notions that would have done credit to Salvation Yeo, but are three hundred years belated now; the Jesuit-artist who finds his passion for painting too strong for his religion—these minor characters are all real men and women sketched by no feeble hand.

The recent typhoon wrought terrible havoc among the fishing fleet on the China coast, and there is no doubt that the loss of life has been appalling. The centre of the trouble seems to have been between Amoy and Ningpo. Nearly a hundred lives were saved by the two steamers Kasun and Loksang alone. The abandoned steamer Trinidad was reported on Sept. 1st drifting in the neighbourhood of Oksan. The Captain of the Rohilla gave her

KOREAN NOTES.

Kim Hongniuk, the once all-powerful Interpreter at the Russian Legation, Sŏul, sometime Governor of Sŏul, Vice-Minister of Education, Chief of the Bureau of Nobility, etc., has fallen. On the 25th August an Imperial decree was issued banishing him to Black Mountain Island, off the coast of South Chullado. This man is another specimen of the wonderful class that once ruled Korea, if the statements—some of which are certainly very remarkable—published about him in the Independent are correct. Our contemporary avers that the banished man could not read either Chinese, Korean, or Russian, and spoke the last language very badly, yet he was interpreter at the Russian Legation for years. The Independent then says:—"The affair of the Feb. 11th, 1896, was a turning point to his life. His Majesty, not from choice, but of necessity, had to take Kim into his confidence. Wealth and honours were heaped on him. He fibbed on both sides, but nobody dared to expose his villany because some thought him to be an angel of light, incapable of any meanness! For over two years much of the government of Korea was practically in the hands of Kim Hongniuk. No Minister of State or Governor of a Province was appointed without his consent, direct or implied. His insolence, intrigues, rascality filled the country with his creatures, the city with his sensual scandals, and the people with indignation. In the meanwhile he was made the Vice-Minister of Education, though he could not sign even his name in any language! He was made the Chief of the Bureau of Nobility! He was appointed the Governor of Sŏul! All this while retaining his position in the Legation as an interpreter. Some time in last April, his dismissal from the Russian service gave great pleasure to all except those Ministers and Vice-Ministers who owed their promotion to the notorious man."

Marquis Ito had a busy time in Sŏul. He was met by the Japanese Minister and the staff of the Legation and deputations of Clubs and merchants, on his landing at Riongsan, on the 25th ultimo. A special sedan chair was sent from the Palace for the use of the Marquis, and a score of Palace constables escorted him to the city. An immense crowd of spectators lined the entire length from the river to the city. An Imperial audience took place about 5 p.m. Next day, the Nam San Poetic Association entertained Marquis Ito in a Japanese restaurant. Among the guests were several high dignitaries of the Korean Government, besides a large number of members of the Society. Most of the guests presented complimentary verses to the distinguished visitor, who was too courteous, says the Independent, not to read them all. On the 29th, the Marquis addressed the students of the Sŏul School, an institution under the control of the Japanese Education Society. He emphasized the importance of education as the best foundation for individual welfare as well as for national prosperity. An elaborate banquet was also given in the distinguished visitor's honour at the Palace. And on the evening of the 29th, the Japanese Minister gave an At Home. We learn that Marquis Ito was in excellent spirits, seeming to be none the worse for the fatigues of the journey of audiences and receptions, when he left for Tientsin on the 30th.

The first locomotive on the Sŏul-Chemulpho railroad was run on a portion of the line on August 17. There were no formal ceremonies on the occasion.

Mr. McLeavy Brown is now Superintendent of Railways in Korea. He is regaining all his former influence.

Mr. Yi Yuin, an ex-Minister of Law, was arrested on the 23rd August on a charge of having sent Yi Tai-jun with a forged Imperial letter to the Hon. Mr. Matsuoka when the latter Minister arrived at Fusan last April.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

The Blue-funnel steamer Antenor went ashore at Woosung bar on the 4th inst., but was successfully floated the same day with the assistance of tugs at high water.

It is reported from Tientsin that at a recent inspection and trial by the Peiyang Naval Board Commissioners of the new German-built cruisers Haiyung and Haichêng, the speed attained by the two vessels was over 21 knots an hour, being more than the speed contracted for.

An Imperial edict of the 1st instant may, says the N.-C. Daily News, be taken as an indication of the struggle that is now going on at Peking between the advocates of reform, headed by the Emperor himself, and the bulk of the conservative party. It appears that a 2nd-class secretary of the Board of Rites, named Wang Hsün, composed a memorial containing suggestions for reforming his Board, and this paper the secretary asked his superior officers, the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Board of Rites, to hand to the Throne on his behalf. The plain language of the writer, denouncing the laziness of his superiors, evidently gave great offence to them and resulted in Huai Ha-pu, the Manchu President of the Board, heading a joint memorial of his colleagues denouncing in no measured terms the audacity and revolutionary ideas of their subordinate and asking that he be severely punished as a warning to others. It must have been like a bolt from the blue when the above-noted edict was issued commanding the memorialists to be handed to the Board of Civil Appointments for the determination of adequate penalties, "for trying to prevent people from making suggestions to the Throne in contravention of his Majesty's previous edicts calling for suggestions from all his subjects, irrespective of rank." The edict also went on to say:—"We are the best judge whether a man's memorial is audacious, traitorous, or not, and we will not trouble our Ministers in the future to consider such matters for us. Henceforth, Ministers and high provincial authorities are forbidden to open and read the memorials which they are asked to present to us on behalf of the writers, and the delinquent President of the Board of Rites is now commanded to hand up to us the alleged offensive memorial of the said secretary Wang Hsün." The Reform Party may therefore be said to be triumphant over their old foes at the present moment.

The China Mutual S. N. Co. announces the intended payment on the 1st prox. on Preference shares in the company of the usual half-yearly dividend of 3 per cent.

M. Pavloff, Russian Chargé d'Affaires at Peking, has been appointed Russian Minister to Korea, and will pay a brief visit to Söul before going home on leave. Mr. de Giers, the new Russian Minister to China, will arrive in about a month's time.

The N.-C. Daily News has every reason to believe, in spite of doubts expressed by the home papers, that Captain W. M. Lang, R.N., is coming out to undertake the reorganisation of the Chinese Navy. Captain Lang will in all probability leave England some time next month, bringing with him a staff of some 35 instructors. Captain Lang was retired from the English Navy last month.

H.E. Huang Chun-hsien, Minister Designate to the Court of Tokyo, arrived at Shanghai from Hunan on Sept. 7th, having stopped en route at Wuchang on a visit to his patron, Viceroy Chang Chih tung. H.E. has been Acting Provincial Judge almost all the time since first he went to Hunan in the capacity of Intendant of the Salt Gabelle, two years ago, and had every chance, says a Shanghai paper, of being made substantive Provincial Judge, but for the Viceroy Chang's opinion that H.E. would be of more use to his country as Minister to Japan, with whose [illegible] by now a [illegible] desire among the Emperor and his Ministers and high officers to maintain closer and more friendly relations.

A telegram has been received in Shanghai by Messrs. Morris & Co. to the effect that Captain and Mrs. Broadhurst and the mate of the barque Comet, news of the wreck of which was telegraphed to the N.-C. Daily News on the 4th instant, have been saved and conveyed to Tamsui. It is conjectured that when the vessel went to pieces they must have drifted ashore on some of the wreckage, and fallen into the hands of the Japanese authorities, by whom they were sent on to Tamsui.

"An Occasional Correspondent" writes from Tientsin to the N.-C. Daily News that His Excellency Sheng, the Chinese railway magnate, has given out that the three special objects of his mission to Peking are assured, viz. (1) The confirmation of the Belgian Syndicate in the Lu-Han railway, (2) the assurance that Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. have got the Nanking-Hankow line, and (3) the definite assertion that the Great Southern track from Hankow to Canton will go to the Americans.

The Taungli Yamên has been commanded by an Imperial decree of the 6th instant to report upon a memorial by Liu Ch'ingao, a first-class Secretary of the same Yamên, upon the necessity of establishing copper cash mints (with foreign machinery) throughout the Empire, in order to obtain a constant supply of the coins, of a uniform size and weight.

According to Reuter's telegram, as it appeared in our Shanghai contemporaries, the trouble in Crete arose out of the British taking over charge of the Tithe office, which the Mussulmans resented.

On 1st ult. a supplementary estimate for £25,000 was issued to Members of the House of Commons in respect of expenditure on Diplomatic and Consular buildings, says the London and China Express. The amount which the Treasury originally asked for in China, Japan, and Korea was £12,500, but an additional £2,000 is now required in order to purchase sites at the new China Treaty ports.

The Universal Gazette has received intelligence from Peking that in all State matters the Emperor decides himself and the Ministers of the Council and Boards are not suffered to do so on their own authority. During the interview of a high official the Emperor commanded him to formulate and report immediately on a scheme for the re-organization of the army, also telling him that he was much disgusted with the Viceroys and Governors, most of whom are inactive in their administration. Viewing from the present circumstances, His Majesty continued, China will fall into a state awful to imagine in less than ten years, and it is essential for the officials to bring their energy to bear upon their actions and discard all former evil practices in order to remedy the position of the country.

FRENCH NOTES.

The Débats comes to the conclusion that the accordeon is an article of the first necessity in France. Since 1896, official figures show, there have been imported into that country 69,114 accordeons, which (hateful fact) chiefly come from Germany. Who would have thought, asks the Débats with some pathos, that in France there could be 60,000 individuals capable of employing their leisure hours in filling with and emptying of wind the most mournful (la plus lamentable) of musical instruments? Nay, many more than 60,000, for that is simply the number of buyers annually. It is to be hoped, for the sake of France's ears, that the passion is a secret one, indulged clandestinely and away from the madding crowd. But, if France cannot do without accordeons, if a deplorably depraved taste demands them, why can they not be manufactured at home?

French papers have an amusing way of [illegible] ing with the British sporting mania. The Débats, speaking of Grace, says:—"A grandiose English figure, and one of the most popular, is about to enter the obscurity of private life. For years Dr. Grace has known the intoxication of triumph. Princes, Ministers, Bishops, have vied in honouring him. A descendant of the Plantagenets, the Duke of Beaufort, now honours himself by presenting to the illustrious cricketer a grand bouquet subscribed for by his admirers. England extends to him adieux worthy of him. It is the retirement of a hero." Here again:—"An English celebrity has just died—Fawnes, the famous coach-driver. His beginnings were modest but precocious; he started at fourteen as a common "cabmann." But gradually his extraordinary gifts brought him fame. His driving astonished the greatest whips. He could drive a coach and four through a wedding ring. He had a succession of aristocratic pupils. He trained coachmen of the greatest distinction, among whom were the Prince of Teck, the Count of Turin, Baron Alfred de Rothschild, and Mr. Clarence Mackay, who, on the occasion of his Jubilee (for, like the Queen, he had a Jubilee) gave him a coach of fabulous price. His funeral was worthy of him. His coffin was placed in a four-in-hand, and was followed by six other carriages with the whips in mourning, the horses in black harness, and the guards blowing their bugles like the trumpets of Judgment Day. The pomp and display were not less than at the funeral of Gladstone. England knows how to honour her heroic dead."

The pupils at the municipal school of Hanoï, French Indo China, have petitioned that half-caste children shall be educated in future apart from Europeans. They say that the Eurasian boys are more Annamite than French. They have all the faults of the Annamite race, and "lack the most elementary principles of morality." In short, they lower the intellectual standard of the class. The Annamites must be a bad lot if they have accomplished a feat hitherto regarded as so difficult—shocking the French sense of morality.

There are two men, said the Journal des Débats recently, in Mr. Bebel, the famous German Socialist. There is, in the first place the exterior man,—the agitator, the apostle who goes everywhere sowing the good seed, that is to say preaching the abolition of private property, and the State ownership of sources of wealth. But there is, besides, the private Bebel, the far-seeing family man who has no other preoccupation than to assure himself of a comfortable journey through life, and to bequeath to his family enough to enable them to live in middle class comfort (largement et bourgeoisement) like himself. In France this contrast between the political man and the private man is so common as not to excite remark, or only to be the subject of a passing joke. But the Germans do not treat it as a matter of pleasantry, as Mr. Bebel has just found. They discovered that this demolisher of private property was himself a proprietor, even as any other. Yes, he actually possessed a pretty little villa which was secured to him by all the ordinary legal formalities. This revelation caused a scandal in the Socialist camp. Called on to explain himself, Bebel confessed his crime; he admitted that the villa belonged to him; but pleaded in mitigation that he lived there very little, that he preferred to let it to the accursed bourgeois who went into the country in search of health; and finally that this villa was not inherited by him, but was the result of his own thrift and industry. These explanations did not appear altogether luminous to the hecklers, and capitalist Bebel passed a bad quarter of an hour. The Germans are naive if they expect such perfect consistency in a modern Socialist.

M. Barrès was a French Isaac Pitman, the apostle of a spelling reform movement, and the founder of a paper called the Réformiste. In his will he leaves 30,000 francs a year for the maintenance of the journal; 12,000 francs a year for six prizes to be awarded by the directors of the Réformiste to persons who have done most in the cause of French spelling reform; and 12,000 francs a year to be distributed to institutions. Other big sums are left to "benefactors of humanity" generally, without reference to their orthographical convictions.

Several Parisian papers make themselves merry over a recent case in Vienna, in which a dentist sued a worthy citizen for 100 odd florins for his wife's new set of teeth. "My wife has no need of such a luxurious set," cried the honest bourgeois to the Judge. "She had an old set, which was quite good enough. I am willing to keep her; I must nurse her if she is ill; but I am not forced to pay for her prodigality." The Judge pointed out that the wife was not thirty, and appearance as well as utility were to be considered. But the citizen was not touched, and persisted in his refusal to pay. And now all the world knows about the poor wife's bad teeth and her sybaritic dental arrangements. It would be interesting to know what she said to the husband when she got home! If she had a tongue of ordinary feminine pattern her spouse must have thought his 100 florins hardly earned. As one paper says:—Ces deux époux ne sont pas séparés, ils vivent ensemble; mais dans quel état d'esprit, grands dieux?

GERMAN NOTES.

The German naval authorities are said to be profoundly convinced of the necessity of using non inflammable wood in the construction of their warships, and they have made numerous experiments in this direction during the past four years, but the results so far have not been altogether satisfactory.

German papers report that the Independance Belge and the Soir, Brussels papers, have instituted lawsuits against Rochefort's paper, the Jour, for slander. The latter stated that they were bribed by the German Government to agitate in favour of Dreyfus. The plaintiffs claim damages to the amount of 150,000 francs.

The Schlesische Zeitung states that in consequence of the high price of coal in the Far East arrangements have been made to transport coal direct from Germany to Kiaochou. The first shipments of 5,000 tons left Germany in May. Meanwhile Diederichsen & Co. have undertaken to run a line of steamers for this purpose between Germany and China, and have already established a coal depôt at Tsingtau. This arrangement is to continue until the coalmines in the Shantung hinterland supply the demand.

The late Reichstag election seems to be fairly satisfactory to all parties. The Socialists have lost some seats and gained others—their clear gain being eight seats. With this they declare themselves satisfied. But in view of the fact that they put up candidates in every district of the empire, their vote, on the whole, was not as large as they had anticipated, and they lost some of their important strongholds, including two manufacturing districts in Berlin. The Centrists gained six seats, they will occupy 104 seats in the new Reichstag, while the National-Liberals have merely held their own, with 49 seats. The South-German party, which had 12 seats, lost four, and the Conservatives 9 they retain only 80 seats. The Poles, who had 20 seats, lost 6; the Alsace-Lorraines lost 1 and retain 8; the Anti-Semites have 12, formerly 16; the Guelphs 9, formerly 8; and the Radicals 40, formerly 44. Politically the new Reichstag will not materially differ from its predecessor, and the Government has every reason to be satisfied.

In view of the recent telegram regarding an alleged agreement between Great Britain and Germany, with reference to Africa and Asia Minor, it may be of interest to note that, according to recent information, the German Anatolian Railway Company has secured a concession from the Turkish Government for the construction of a railway, of 230 kilometers, from Haider Padra to Cæsares, and the same company has received a concession for the construction and maintenance of a harbour at Haider Padra. Other railway projects are connected with these, and eventually the Anatolian railway is to be prolonged to the sea. The Turkish Government, as is well known, is far more friendly to Germany than to Russia. The Russian papers are now beginning to agitate against this so-called "German policy of expansion," though the two governments seem to be on the best of terms. The Novoe Vremya, in a recent leader, said:—"There is good ground for the supposition that the railways that have been built with German capital, or are now projected, are intended as centres around which great German colonies will be established, for the concessions carry with them enormous tracts of land. The Germans are establishing agricultural schools, teach the Turkish employés the German language, and in every way promote German interests. Thus, gradually and without much ado, the Germans are taking possession of Asia Minor and are acquiring supremacy at Constantinople. The matter is simple enough. If Germany makes an attempt to acquire a port in Asia Minor, Russia must either pass it by without protest or else lose patience and occupy the Bosphorus." The Novoe Vremya has evidently not troubled to consider English opinion on the latter point.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

On Wednesday morning at 1 o'clock another fire occurred at a godown belonging to a merchant living at Shiwo-cho, Nihonbashi.

A case of cholera has appeared in Yokohama, the victim being a rice dealer named Kama, Heizo, 37 years of age, living at Ogimachii 4-chome. He was sent to the hospital.

On Tuesday morning fire broke out at the Chitose restaurant, near Shimbashi station, Tokyo, and two houses were totally destroyed and one injured. The houses of the Komparu Geisha being close by, great excitement prevailed for some hours.

On the 11th, at 4.30 a.m., a man named Akimoto Yonosuke (39), living at Iida-machi, Kojimachi, Tokyo, murdered his concubine and their infant, and then committed suicide by stabbing himself with a sword. The man is said to have been temporarily insane.

Says the China Mail, with fine sarcastic terseness:—To judge from the agitation in some of the foreign newspapers in Japan for the improvement of Japanese prisons, one would imagine that the whole of the foreign population was about to be committed under life sentences.

The lights on Corregidor Island and at the mouth of the Pasig were restored on 26th August, and the obstructions in the Pasig River removed so far as to give a practicable channel of 15 feet depth at high water. Work is still going on for the removal of wrecks from the river.

When the M. M. steamer Laos arrived off Socotra on her voyage out, it was discovered that a fire had broken out in one bunker. The vessel was anchored off the island, and in ten hours the fire was extinguished. Another delay occurred at Djibouti, in receiving Cardiff coals to supplement an inferior kind she had received.

News has been received in Yokohama to the effect that Mr. Freeman, the Chaplain of the U.S.S. Baltimore, drowned himself at Nagasaki on Monday. His state of mind has given anxiety for some time. The body has been recovered, and will be embalmed and taken to the States. Mrs. Freeman, who left for San Francisco on the Gaelic on Tuesday, received a brief telegram conveying the sad news.

The Yokohama Specie Bank held its general meeting on the 10th at 2.30 p.m., Mr. Iwasaki presiding. The report for the half-year showed that the total profit amounted to yen 1,434,399.59. Of this yen 300,000 was passed to reserve account, yen 69,582 distributed as presents among the employés, yen 676,000 appropriated as dividend, yen 50,000 aside for the expenses of the new office, and yen 329,817.59 carried to the next account.

When the P. & O. steamer Rohilla sighted the Trinidad, after the typhoon, the now abandoned vessel was showing a board on the bridge bearing the words, "Ship Full of Water," also an American Ensign, Union down, at the main, the English Pilot Jack with a knot in it forward, and the Greek Ensign underneath. It appears that during the typhoon the after house was washed bodily overboard, with all the signal flags, and this accounts for the extraordinary distress signal hoisted. Two steamers passed before the Rohilla, apparently without observing the distressed steamer. For two days the crew subsisted on biscuit and water.

Education is progressing among the masses of the old country. The following effusion, which was read at a country Police Court, is from the brain—or its equivalent—of a housemaid aged seventeen:—

> Oh, my darling. To be with you is the only hope and desire of my heart. No flower on earth ever grew that can be compared to thy imperial beauty. Oh, to be on some high mountain alone with thee taking sweet kisses from thy lovely lips.

It was a letter to her lover, a bus driver. The latter, accepting the invitation expressed in these fervid lines, pressed his "lovely lips" on the poetic Mary Ann's as she rode on the top of his bus. And then she summoned him! Feminine, quite feminine.

TERRIBLE BOAT ACCIDENT NEAR CANTON.

(From the "China Mail.")

Canton, Sept. 3.

In the Tung Koon District is a large village called Tai Fan Heung, containing a temple dedicated to Hong Kung Chue Shui. Worship at the shrine of this god is said to be most efficacious, and thousands of worshippers visit the temple every year. Once every ten years, a great and special festival, which draws a vast number of people from far and near, is held. The tenth anniversary fell this year, and has just closed under very sad circumstances.

On Wednesday night (August 31st), while the theatricals were in full swing, one of the mat-sheds caught fire. Fortunately, the fire was soon extinguished, otherwise a loss of life ten times greater than that which we report would have to be chronicled.

The following morning a large number of Chinese, scared by what they regarded as a bad omen, left Tai Fan Heung for their homes. The passage-boat for Canton was especially crowded, and every available spot had a passenger. All went well on the way down the East river till the main stream was reached. Here one of those sudden squalls so common on this river came on before the great bat-wing sail could be furled, and over the vessel heeled with its living freight. Only a few of the passengers on the deck or upper part of the ship escaped, while not one of those boxed up in the cabins has survived to tell what the awful sensation must have been when they felt the ship turning over and saw the rush of water which cut off any possibility of escape.

Yesterday, the Benevolent Society of Canton sent a boat to the scene of the disaster, which is said to be near the Ap Tun Customs station. A terrible and indescribable sight presented itself when the bottom of the passage boat was broken open. The bodies were arranged on the bank of the river, and afterwards placed in coffins, supplied by the Benevolent Society. One notices with interest a new departure. Photographs are made of the coffins with their occupants to facilitate the identification of the deceased by BRITISH ACTION IN CRETE LEADS TO RIOT AND BLOODSHED.

London, Sept. 8.

In pursuance of the decision of the foreign Admirals at Crete the British on Tuesday took over the town of Candia. The Mussulmans showing active opposition, the British soldiers fired, wounding several. The Mussulmans, exasperated, set fire to the Christian quarter. The Admirals have requested the Powers to insist on immediate reinforcements of 15,000 Bashi Bazouks and the recall of Turkish troops from Crete.

London, Sept. 15.

The Empress was stabbed in the bosom with a slender triangular file while proceeding in a steamboat to the pier from the hotel. Her Majesty was at first unaware that she was wounded. She imagined that the ruffian simply attempted to steal her watch. Her Majesty died about three hours after. Intense excitement prevails in Vienna. The crime is an outcome of the Anarchist conspiracy.

teen years has been inseparably connected with every movement for the furtherance of the game." His death, which occurred on June 4th, is universally mourned in England, where his work as an editor and his achievements as a player were so well known and so highly appreciated. This problem, taken from The British Chess Magazine, "was composed," so we are informed, "about the hour Mr. Rayner was passing away."

Answers to Correspondents.

G.H.B.W.—The pieces are quite clear in all the copies we have seen. But we will consider your suggestion.

W.B.M.—Best thanks, will use it soon!

H.B.N.—"The Hastings Chess Tournament" edited by Horace F. Cheshire contains perhaps the best collection of modern master games. Re problem, see above.

W.H.S.—Yes, it is a 2 mover and the position correct.

Shadow-Pictures of the Vienna Players.

Speaking of the masters who played in Vienna, Herr Armin Friedmann, writes in the Pester Lloyd as follows:—

"Only two famous names are missing—Emanuel Lasker, of Berlin, the giant-killer, and Rudolph Charousek, of Budapest, the genial victor at Berlin, of last year.

"The Master is carefully nursing his young fame and wraps it in wadding so that it may not suffer damage, and evidently does not dare to subject it to the sharp draught of an international tourney. The young matador of Budapest is evidently more courageous and more cautious of triumphs, but a malignant and serious sickness prevents his playing. . . .

"There he is, the old, the great William Steinitz, for fully thirty years the sole, supreme ruler in the realm of Chess, who held the world's record with an iron hand until there came along young Lasker, who compelled him to abdicate. Blooming youth conquered decaying age. The health of Steinitz is no longer of the best, and to this is added the grueful cares of daily life, which cause him anxiety. He began in Vienna in the brilliant form of his palmiest days. At the very outset he conquered his old antagonist, Tschigorin; then followed victory upon victory, until at last the powerful swing of his wings grew weaker and his mighty flight was checked. Since then he does not make the same progress, but is among the possibilities. The hoary veteran may still pull himself together, and, recovering his strength, may forge ahead. Let me give fair warning: Steinitz will deprive many a contestant of an important game in this pending contest, because even one half of Steinitz would make a formidable enemy, and when the old lion is aroused he is dangerous. 'Although I am old, no one must put his finger in my mouth, or I'll bite,' he said in 1892, and it is still true of him to-day.

Steinitz is a small man, his great head resting upon a strong body, which, however, his weak limbs can hardly bear. . . . The full face, enframed by a thin, reddish beard, is almost beautiful, especially when the left profile is observed, and he gazes thoughtfully upon the Chess-board. The mighty domelike forehead predominates over all. In his intercourse he is amiable, modest, pleasant. One wishes he may gain the victory; he is so accustomed to victories that without them he can not live. His is, indeed, a deeply tragic fate. Almost for half a century, to countless people, he has given pleasure and joy, and for his ceaseless toil and almost superhuman intellectual efforts he received almost nothing in return. . . .

"Old Mr. Blackburne, of London, is also present—a chieftain with the most immovable quietude of soul, whom nothing on earth could throw out of his equanimity. He too, was at one time a mighty victor, and in many an important contest did he carry off first honors. He bears his misfortunes less tragically; he smokes his short-stemmed pipe, and quietly addresses his victorious antagonist in German, using the only two German words he has learned here—one of which is not German at that—Grosser Ganef. . . .

"One of the strongest Vienna players is the officious, busy Secretary of the Club, George Marco, and his system of annihilating and crushing his opponents is feared by all. Unfortunately, his head is filled with administration details, in addition to which he edits match reports, publishes books and periodicals devoted to Chess, sends telegrams and cables broadcast, so that, as a penny-a liner expressed it—it requires his massive brain to produce his results. Marco is the most good-natured giant, the most amiable ogre that can be imagined. Three Schlechters, thin and lean, could easily be carved out of him, and there would be enough left to make a complete Waldrodt. This fellow Marco is an original one; he loves the big, polysyllabic words, the most grotesque exaggerations, and his comparisons are confined to exotics and the strangest specimens of botany. The whole tropical world opens when he bombastically preaches. He is the Freiligrath of Chess. . . .

"Social old Adolph Schwartz, a native of Hungary, resigned soon after the opening of the Tournament, and has taken his seat among the 'lookers-on in Venice.' They wouldn't let him win a single game and he got angry. . . .

"Dr. Tarrasch is one of the strongest of living Chess-players. He educated himself on the lines of Adolph Anderssen and Louis Paulsen, but developed his own energetic style to a high degree of independence. Out of the smallest advantages of position; out of particles—one may say—he builds up the chance to win. This then grows and grows and steadily increases—and every avalanche was once but a tiny snowflake. He knows naught that is immaterial; naught that is insignificant; he considers and uses everything if it can be turned to good account for his hidden objects. Admirable is his appreciation of safe positions. The safest is to him the best; daring experiments he does not attempt. He loves to bring about complications; he orchestrates somewhat strongly because he presumes that his opponent does not feel at home as much as he does. Personally he is a gentleman of the world, with the most elegant of manners; genial, sarcastic, witty, and sharp-tongued. . . .

"Geza Maroczi, of Budapest, engineer of the water department of that city, is the only Hungarian player here, and he wins a great deal of honour for his fatherland. The vehemence of his attacks is universally feared, and the very best take him seriously. . . .

"Pillsbury is a beardless young man, whose Anglo-American origin is easily read in his face. His profile is cameo-like, nobly cut. Every movement is dignified and gentle elegance. For such a youth to acquire so much self constraint, deliberation, and coolness is wonderful, and could only have been obtained by occupation at the Chess-board. When Pillsbury sits at the board, he has an absolute stony calmness in his face; not a muscle moves; only now and then will he wink a bit faster when he feels himself slowly and satisfactorily nearing the goal, so finely calculated and elaborated. He is a disciple of Grand Master Steinitz. The idiosyncracies and stubbornness of the veteran he has acquired, but he plays in grand style always, the simplest moves which conform to his purpose. The victor of Hastings plays the openings like a master; the middle game he treats powerfully, and with grandeur; the most complicated positions of the end he treats with astonishing finesse, and with the most positive assurance he grasps the knottiest threads and the most complicated entanglements.

"His friend and compatriot, Showalter, whom he had but lately conquered in a match, is a tall, handsome, blond man, blue-eyed, with martial mustache. . . .

"Amos Burn, of Liverpool, is a serious Chess-ascetic. As for him all the governments of the world could go into shreds to-morrow, if his white and black Kings retain their reign over the board. Burn is a silent Britisher in blue-flannel. With broad-soled shoes, he tramps through the world in which, however, he does not seem to take any interest. He does not deem it worthy of a look through his eye-glasses. His hair, parted in the middle, falls over his forehead, in which there is thought only for Chess, and when his bony hand grasps his brown full beard at the chin, it is done only to think more seriously over the problem, which variation of Ruy Lopez would just then be the most advantageous.

"Janowsky, from Paris, a young dark-eyed Pole, wearing glasses, who plays as elegantly as he does forcibly, is an outspoken enemy of all 'draws.' With him there is no such a thing as a weary 'sitting out' game, and nothing does he hate more cordially than stubbornness. His play is, according to a remark of his own, like Mary Stuart, 'beautiful, but unfortunate.' . . .

"Tschigorin, whose genuine Slavic type and genial appearance arouse immediate attention, must be, whatever may be his achievements in Vienna, recognized as one of the foremost stars. He is somewhat stubborn, and that costs him many a potent point in his score. He plays the 'old school,' with brilliant attacking combinations, and boldly rushes to penetrate the very Chess-board, and the figures of the enemy he looks at with hatred, malice, and contempt, a veritable passionate, fighting Pole."

An Interesting Ending.

A friendly match was recently in progress between teams selected from the House of Commons and the Press Gallery. There were eleven players a side, and two games will be contested between each pair as convenience admits. According to the latest advices the members score 3 to 1, since Horace Plunkett, the best player in the House, has won his two games with B. F. Bussey of the Glasgow Herald. C. E. Shaw, a local M. P., has defeated H. V. Bussey of the Morning Post, and J. Parnell, M. P., has lost to Mr. Amphlett of the Press Association.

In January of this year a national chess organization was formed in Italy, under the name of the Italian Chess Union, with Baron Georg Sonnino as president. It has about 350 members and is growing. On September 19th a chess congress will be held in Turin under the management of the union. The Ruy Lopez has been named as the official organ.

Pillsbury is authority for the statement that a committee consisting of representative chess players of all nations has been formed to work out a universal chess code. The Vienna tournament was played under the rules of the "Handbuch," and these will form the basis of the new code.

THE improved tone in the import trade is maintained, and in yarns and shirtings business is being done at advancing prices, while in fancy woollens and cottons the outlook is also more healthy. Transactions are being done in metals, and there is an increased business in sugar. In all departments, in fact, the official announcement of the inauguration of the new tariff has had its effect. With regard to exports, things are not so brisk as they were a week or two back. The raw silk market shows a stubborn dullness, and buyers in America are still apathetic, consequently prices have a downward tendency, and the large stock on hand, 10,760 piculs, shows little prospect of moving. A fair business is being done in waste silk, and small but steady transactions are reported in tea, chiefly as regards the lower grades.

FINANCE.

The time is not far distant when some final decision will have to be taken about the Budget for 1899-1900, in order that it may be ready for submission to the Diet. Of course public opinion is considerably exercised on the subject. Financial questions wrecked the last two Cabinets, and financial questions promise to test the stability of the present Ministry, perhaps beyond endurance. For good or for evil the Government seems to have resolved not to increase the Land Tax, but to rely chiefly on the saké tax and minor sources of revenue, supplemented by a draft of ten million yen from the Indemnity. It should be explained that we gather this programme from the vernacular press, and have no information of our own either to confirm or to contradict it. The Indemnity offers a very convenient exit from pressing difficulties, but to rely on it is a purely temporizing policy which will not help to improve the country's credit abroad. It is true that the Cabinet proposes to increase the tax upon urban building lands. That is a measure the justice of which we have often pointed out, though we fail to see how it can be fairly accomplished without a careful re-assessment of the lands in question. The official plan is said to be very simple, namely, to multiply the present rate by ten. Rumour, however, does not appear to be accurate in this instance, for it assigns an increased revenue of 4 million yen as the result of multiplying the urban land tax by ten. But the present yield of the tax is 802,483 yen, and it is therefore obvious that the proposed change of rate would produce an additional revenue of 7 millions, not 4. Why ten is chosen as a multiplier we do not know. According to a calculation made by us last year, 37,569,005 persons living in rural districts pay land tax aggregating 37,866,508 yen, or a little more than 1 yen per head; whereas 4,244,210 inhabitants of urban districts pay only 802,483 yen, or about 19 sen per head. If those figures alone be considered, the rate of the tax in urban districts should be multiplied by about five. But if we examine areas, we find that the tax on each acre of urban land is 5.15 yen, and that on each acre of rural land 3.28 yen. In truth, neither population alone nor area alone can be taken as a fair basis of taxation. It is absolutely necessary to conduct careful investigations into the actual market value of the land. Perhaps the most striking view of the case is obtained by examining the value of the urban lands according to the present scale of taxation. If an acre pays 5.15 yen, a tsubo pays 0.43 sen, and since the tax is supposed to be 2½ per cent. of the value of the land, it follows that the urban lands throughout the empire are assessed at an average value of about 17 sen per tsubo for purposes of taxation. That is sufficiently startling. Think of the land in Tokyo, Osaka, and Kyoto being valued at an average of 17 sen per tsubo! We doubt whether the average in Tokyo can be less than ten yen, or about sixty times the assessment. But when we speak of "urban lands," we include the 38 principal provincial towns. Would it be fair to multiply the rate by ten in their case also? That is the question. Tokyo ought to pay twenty or thirty times its present tax at least, and Osaka and Kyoto could doubtless afford to be raised by fifteen hundred per cent., but if equality of incidence be desired, many of the provincial towns should not have a larger multiplier than five. Neither would the plan of applying a uniform multiplier be just even for a particular city, for values have undergone such enormous variations during the past twenty-five years that the old assessments have become totally inapplicable, and should be immediately altered independently of the question of a general increase of rate. We are informed that, in one part of Tokyo, land which can be sold in the open market to-day for 70 or 80 yen per tsubo, is assessed for taxation purposes at 8 sen! Is it not strange that a Government which finds itself confronted by difficulties in adjusting the national finances, should hesitate to correct such glaring injustices?

Nothing can be more certain, in our opinion, than that the land tax will ultimately have to be raised. It is only a question of time. The advocates of the measure are gaining in numbers and influence every day, and, on the other hand, the project of raising the rate on urban lands while leaving the rural untouched is naturally provoking opposition, though no one examining the figures can doubt for a moment that the owners of urban lands do not contribute anything like the same proportion to the State revenues as do the owners of rural lands. The Fiji Shimpo unfortunately has never wavered for many months past in denouncing all increase of the land tax and urging that reliance be placed solely on the sake tax. There was a time when the Fiji came out "flat-footed" in favour of augmenting the land tax, but for some unexplained reason it abandoned that attitude, and it now lends the weight of its great influence with almost wearisome persistence to the sake tax alone. In two recent articles it called upon the Government to abolish all the petty and vexatious taxes now levied—the taxes on jinrikisha, on boats, on carpenters, on actors, on dancing girls, on plasterers, on hunters, on fishermen, on prostitutes (!) and so forth—, and to place the burden on sake only. As to the people who oppose the transfer of prison expenditures to the Treasury, the Fiji declares that they don't care two straws about the principle involved, but are simply anxious to avoid everything that might lead to an increase of the land tax.

Another argument advanced with much assurance is that whereas the returns obtained from direct and indirect taxation in Japan are nearly equal, they stand in the ratio of nearly 1 to 3 in England and France. The figures for Japan are:—

	YEN.
Direct Taxes
Land Tax	38,566 902
Business Tax	5,769,475
Income Tax	1,999,337
Total	46,335 714
Indirect Taxes.
Saké Tax	32 311,979
Soy Tax	1,570,305
Customs Dues	7,415 577
Tobacco Monopoly	7,299 608
Total	48 636 469

In England the corresponding figures are said to be £19,320,000, and £48,420,000. Such, at least, are the numbers given by the Fiji Shimpo, but whence it obtains them we can not imagine. The revenue from indirect taxes in Great Britain is certainly 18 millions sterling (i.e. 21 millions from the customs and 27 millions from excise), but the revenue from direct taxes is not 19½ millions; it is 33 millions. If England's case is to be cited, the Fiji might be asked to observe that whereas Japan already derives from her excise a revenue more than four times as great as she derives from her customs, the yield of the former in England is not a third greater than the yield from the latter. Comparisons are not unlikely to mislead, first, if they are inaccurate, and secondly, if they are made without reflection.

THE BUDGET.

It is stated that the cabinet has finally agreed about the Budget for next fiscal year. A temporary difficulty was caused in connexion with the appropriations asked for by the Departments of War and the Navy. What the exact figures were it is difficult to make out, but the fact is pretty certain that the Finance Minister endeavoured to make reductions to which the Ministers of War and the Navy could not agree. They consented, however, to consult with the officials of their Departments, and the outcome of the consultation was that a million yen might be cut off the Army's appropriations, and eight or nine hundred thousand off the Navy's. On that basis a compromise was effected, and when the Cabinet met on the 16th instant, no further difficulty presented itself. The excess of expenditure over revenue is said to be 35 million yen, and it will be met, partially at all events, by raising the rates of the Saké Tax, the Tobacco monopoly, the Urban Land Tax, the Registration Tax, the Income Tax, and the tax on drugs, this last being substituted for the sugar tax originally contemplated. The Saké Tax is expected to yield an additional twenty million yen, but it seems very problematical whether 15 millions can be obtained from the other sources here indicated. Of course if the rate of the tax on urban lands be multiplied by ten, an increase of 7 millions will be obtained, which would leave only 8 millions to be supplied from the Tobacco Monopoly, the Registration Tax, the Income Tax, and the Drugs Tax. We place no credit, however, in the rumour which attributes to the Government such a drastic policy about the Urban Lands.

It is said that the total expenditures appearing in the Budget for 1899-1900 are 230 million yen, whereas the revenue from all sources now available is only 195 millions. These figures of course include the extraordinary outlays under the post-bellum programme and the corresponding draft—32,180,000 yen—made upon the Indemnity. To meet the deficit, the following plan is indicated by the vernacular press as the Government's final decision:—

Saké Tax, ...	20 millions additional revenue.
Tax on Urban Building Lands, ...	4½ or 3½ millions. " "
Tax on Sugar	5 millions " " "
Income and Registration Taxes	3 " " " "
Tobacco and Customs	4 " " " "
Total	36½ or 35½ millions.

It will be observed that a tax on sugar is included, though the general belief has been that it would not be resorted to, and that the additional yields from customs duties (under the new tariff), and from tobacco under the greatly increased rate said to be contemplated, are put down at only 4 millions. The table is probably an approximation.

BARON IWASAKI'S DETRACTORS.

It is the penalty of success in every form to create enemies. We should have imagined that Baron Iwasaki Yanosuke might have proved an exception to the rule, for it would be difficult to find a more generous, upright, and unostentatious man. But his turn has come, and we must pay his enemies the compliment of saying that they go about their work of defamation in a most thorough-paced manner. One of them is Mr. Otegawa Toyojiro, a Professor of Political Economy. This gentleman, we believe, formerly held a post in the Bank of Japan, and since he dates the loss of it from Baron Iwasaki's Presidency, people that look for motives can find one without difficulty in his case. He delivered an address the other day at a meeting of the Pacific Ocean Society (Taihei-yo Kyakai), taking Baron Iwasaki for his subject, and abusing him roundly. The lecture was framed on two lines of thought: the first, a kind of philosophic protest against appointing to the presidency of the country's central banking institution a man whose only qualification is the possession of a large fortune; the second, a passionate and wild protest against plutocracy. Concerning the former point, Professor Otegawa's contention was that the affairs of the Bank of Japan should be controlled either by a scholar or a politician—one of the strangest principles ever enunciated by a student of finance—but instead of attempting to demonstrate his proposition, he confined himself to vague abuse of Baron Iwasaki, denouncing him as a man of sentiment rather than of fairness, and declaring that to invest him with such power was like "putting an iron club into the hand of a demon" (oni ni kanabo). As to the plutocratic issue, the Professor would have it believed that nearly all the statesmen of the country are under Baron Iwasaki's thumb, and he named, as occupying that dependent place, Marquis Ito, Count Inouye, Count Okuma, Count Matsukata, and Messrs. Oishi, and Ozaki. The audience did not listen to these invectives patiently. There were frequent interruptions and protests, and occasional threats of violent interruption, but the Professor had the satisfaction of ventilating all his resentment.

A more formidable assault upon the Baron is made by the Sekai-no-Nippon. This is a magazine with a chequered career. Formerly it was supposed to be an organ of Count Mutsu, and at that time it appeared once a month. Its editor, Mr. Takenokoshi Yasaburo, was one of Japan's best penmen. He managed to make his pages so attractive that the magazine achieved remarkable success; success which seemed to warrant the issue of a daily newspaper under the same name. The newspaper not making its mark, however, had to be abandoned, and now the Sekai-no-Nippon (World of Japan) has been changed into a weekly, describing itself as a combination of newspaper and periodical. It signalizes its new departure by a vehement assault upon Baron Iwasaki, contained in an article headed Mitsu Bishi Dai-o Denka (His Majesty the Great King Mitsu Bishi). The writer has obviously drawn his inspiration from the same source as Professor Otegawa. There is no interest in his diatribe, except when he descends from rhetorical generalities to particulars, and then he advances a curious charge. It is this:—Baron Iwasaki, when he became President of the Bank of Japan, sold all the public loan bonds then in his possession, to the number of 30,000—in other words, three million yen worth—the market price being high. Then he raised the Bank's rate of interest, which of course had the effect of lowering the market price of bonds, so that he was able to repurchase what he had unloaded, and is now the possesser of 180,000—or 18 million yen worth. We call that a curious charge, but in truth it deserves a much stronger epithet. For, in the first place, the original sale of bonds—supposing it to have taken place—can not have had any conceivable connexion with Baron Iwasaki's Presidency, and its mention in that context is, therefore, worse than silly. In the second, the assertion that the Bank's rate of interest was raised is wholly irrelevant, unless the Sekai-no-Nippon intends us to believe that the step was taken simply in pursuance of Baron Iwasaki's financial schemes; a maliciously absurd suggestion, for we know that the measure was inevitably dictated by the public exigencies of the time, and that the responsibility for it rests primarily; not, with the President of the Bank, but with the Minister of State for Finance. As a matter of fact, the policy of the Bank under Baron Iwasaki's presidency has been eminently successful, and when we are asked to believe that it was a policy subserved simply to Baron Iwasaki's private interests, we can only smile. In the third place, the dishonesty of the attack is further demonstrated by the final reference to 18 million yen worth of bonds. For if the quotation of that figure means anything, it mean that the Mitsu Bishi firm, by manipulating the market, managed to acquire ultimately six times as many bonds as were originally sold, a monstrous blague. Speaking from a foreign point of view, we can assure Professor Otegawa and the editor of the Sekai-no-Nippon that the impression produced by their assaults is unfavourable, not to the Mitsu Bishi, but to themselves, and that when we read their remarks we are chiefly surprised that they should think the public so gullible. If they limited themselves to an attack on plutocracy we could sympathise with them, for, as we read the history of Japanese ethics, plutocracy has hitherto been contrary to the genius of the people, and its first appearance among them may naturally excite feelings of aversion. But their attempt to prove that a plutocrat is a rascal, especially when Baron Iwasaki is the object of their accusation, suggests that they have a very low estimate of public intelligence.

IMPORTS UNDER THE NEW TARIFF.

The Official Gazette publishes the following Instruction over the signature of the Minister of State for Finance:—"With regard to goods which, though entering a port of import previously to the day fixed for the enforcement of the General Tariff enacted by Law No. 14 of the 30th year of Meiji, are not passed through the final stages of the procedure relating to imports until after that day, it is notified that such goods, whether stored in bonded warehouses or not, shall come under the operation of the Tariff, unless their invoices have been received by the Customs prior to the day for enforcing the Tariff.

COUNT ITAGAKI AND THE PRISON OFFICIALS.

Count Itagaki seems to have delivered a very eloquent and a very practical speech to the meeting of prison officials which took place in the Home Department on the 16th instant. If we had the full text of the speech, we should translate it verbatim, but a brief epitome alone is published. Much in the way of prison reform had been done, the Count said, during the Meiji era. But much remained to be done, and its doing concerned the welfare of the people at home, as well as their reputation abroad. Therefore he made this matter a prime object of his administration. The transfer of the control of all the prisons to the Central Government, the improvement of the prison buildings and the reform of the system—these were measures of imperative necessity. Prisoners had no voice to express their feelings. It depended on the treatment they received whether they became wholly shameless and thriftless. The prison should be a place to educate them as much as a place to punish them. Both aims must be carefully contemplated in arranging and carrying out the system of management. Otherwise the jails, instead of acting as reformatories, would become centres of pestilence, poisoning the morals of the nation. The Minister did not dwell upon the details of his projects. They were submitted in the form of a draft programme, concerning which he invited frank expressions of opinion from his audience at a future meeting. But he laid considerable emphasis upon the advisability of establishing a school for the education of prison officials.

QUESTIONS OF REVENUE.

Everything goes to show that the Cabinet has resolved to tax sugar. As to the amount of the impost we have no information, but rumour says that the revenue realized is expected to be at least four million yen. There will be some interest in observing what method of procedure is adopted for collecting the tax in the case of imported sugar.

With regard to tobacco, it has become quite plain that, in order to make the monopoly a prolific source of revenue, the duty on foreign tobacco will have to be largely augmented. We may expect that the measures necessary to achieve that end will soon be inaugurated. Something similar must be done in the case of alcohol and Chinese samshu also, or the twelve-yen tax on Japanese saké will not yield anything like the income anticipated. Figures are published, showing the growth that has taken place during recent years in the import of the Chinese liquor. Thus:—

In 1893 and 1894 the import did not exceed	Yen. 10 000 worth.
In 1895 (after the war) it rose to ...	16,855
In 1896 (especially after the raising of the tax on Japanese saké from 4 to 7 yen per koku) it rose to	25,549
In 1897 it rose to	66,323
In 1898, up to the end of August, it was	...109,550

Already the import duty on samshu is 40 per cent. ad valorem, but it will have to be greatly increased.

THE KOREAN POISONING AFFAIR.

According to the latest intelligence, the instigator of the attempt to poison the Emperor and the Crown Prince of Korea was Kim Heung-yuk, who attracted so much attention recently in connection with the plot to dethrone the Sovereign. The evidence upon which this new development rests is said to have been furnished by one Ko, a species of chamberlain, so far as we can judge from the telegrams, which are naturally somewhat obscure in the matter of names and offices. The cook who prepared the poisonous viands was first interrogated, as a matter of course—interrogated, presumably, in such a manner as to elicit a confession whether or no there was anything to confess—, and he having incriminated Ko, the latter in turn had to under-go the questioning process, with the result that the guilt was finally fixed on Kim. Our readers know all about Kim—how he is an uneducated man of low origin; how he made his way in his youth to Vladivostock and acquired a certain facility in speaking Russian; how, returning to Söul, he became interpreter to the Russian Legation; how, after the King's flight to the Legation, he obtained immense influence in his capacity of sole medium of communication; how he abused his trust; how he was attacked in the street and wounded, and how he afterwards engaged in plots which led to his exile. Kim, in short, is understood to to have rebelled against the decadence of Russian influence and the consequent loss of his own power, though, of course, nobody supposes that Russian instigation had anything to do with his treason. His wife has been arrested on suspicion of complicity, and doubtless he will soon be in the clutches of the law himself.

Japanese opinion is obviously somewhat inchoate with regard to this incident and the lesson it teaches. Certain publicists declare that it is highly dangerous to meddle with a country where politics revolve in a vicious circle of the most treacherous conspiracies and the foulest crimes, and that Japan should hold aloof altogether from the official world of the new empire, confining herself solely to the fields of commerce and industry. Others urge with equal conviction that a hotbed of intrigue can not be left smoking almost within sight of Japan, and that something must be done to remove this unwholesome nuisance. But with regard to one point there appears to be tolerable unanimity, namely, that the return of Boku Yeiko to his country at this juncture would be decidedly dangerous and might expose Japan to very injurious suspicions. It seems to be thought, even by Boku's friends, that, though clever and enterprising, he is rash, self-opinionated, impatient, and not gifted with the faculty of estimating his opportunities at their true value. He would surely attempt a coup of some kind on getting back to Söul. It fact, a coup would be so generally expected from him that he would not have strength of mind to resist the pressure of public anticipation. On the other hand, whatever he did would unquestionably be supposed to have been suggested, if not actually assisted, by his Japanese friends. His movements are thus a source of anxiety with which we can all sympathise. It must be admitted that there is full occasion for skilful steering on Japan's part in Korea.

KOREA PARTITIONED.

People that propround projects of international spoliation in print generally betray a coy diffidence and affect a diplomacy of expression not particularly consistent with the nature of their proposals. The editor of the Sekai-no-Nippon is cast in a different mould from these soft-voiced suggestors of robbery. He has no manner of diffidence, but says what he has to say with the bluntest frankness. At the same time, we are rather at a loss to determine whether his latest essay is a genuine exposé of the policy he would like to see pursued by Japan, or whether it is chiefly inspired by a desire to attack Count Okuma. The latter he declares to be a man of words not deeds. A statesman of apparently great potentialities when, hidden in the seclusion of Waseda, the count talks bravely of things that might be and contemptuously of things that are, but he is a god whose gilding quickly peels off when exposed to the sun-light of administrative activity. In the time of proof, he has no acts to offer but only pregnant suggestions, as when he amuses and deludes the nation with vague talk about an Anglo-American-Japanese alliance.

Now it must be confessed that the editor's way of putting these things is very pretty. It suggests the idea of a skilled swordsman making passes at Count Okuma with a bright and nimble weapon, which might be thrust home at any moment if its wielder wished. But here the writer's art becomes defective. Forgetting the fine old principle that something must always be left to the reader's imagination, he proceeds to explain exactly what policy the Count ought to pursue. With regard to the Anglo-American-Japanese alliance, he recalls the story of England, France, and Holland at the beginning of the 18th century. (The allusion is very vague, but we presume that it refers to the Peace of Utrecht in 1713, which certainly taught Holland that, while the great Powers of Europe were very ready to employ her resources for warlike purposes, they were equally ready to sacrifice her interests and abandon her to her fate, when they desired peace.) Japan, he says, would be more than likely to repeat the experience of the Dutch if she joined her arms with those of England and America at the present juncture. She would find herself at the end standing alone in the lists with an infuriated Russia for vis-à-vis. What then is the alternative? It is very simple. Propose to Russia the partition of Korea. There is no use in mincing matters. Has not that been Japan's aim all along? As for Russia, she will jump at the proposal. Nothing could be more to her mind. Try her, and if she refuses, it will be time enough to treat her as an enemy.

The flagrant inconsistency of the above line of argument is that the charge against Count Okuma is based on his failure to pursue such a policy. Most people will count it to his credit that he refrains from any iniquitous coup of the kind. If all our little nostrums could be put into practice, what a very sick world it would be, to be sure!

THE NEW PALACE GUARD IN KOREA.

Sept. 19.

According to telegrams which appear to be accurate, the Emperor of Korea has engaged 30 Europeans and Americans and 10 coloured men to form a palace guard. They are said to have been enlisted in Shanghai by Mr. Greathouse and carried to Chemulpo in the Sagami Maru, reaching Söul on the morning of the 16th. This appears to us to be the most ill-advised step yet taken in that curiously and badly administered little empire. Even if the Sovereign had hitherto made no enemies, the engagement of a band of aliens to protect his palace and his person against his own subjects, would at once obtain for him a large measure of unpopularity. But he has already an abundance of enemies. Indeed it does not seem that he has established any title to the respect or affection of his subjects, and, remembering these facts, we can not regard this last measure as anything but suicidal. Has His Majesty obeyed an idea of his own, or is he merely following a suggestion of his foreign advisers? We strongly suspect that the conception, like the guard, is foreign, and if so, the persons responsible for it are not to be complimented. Were the King an enlightened monarch bent upon reforming the national institutions and on leading his country into the ways of progress, and were the dangers that threaten him due to his civilizing energy, something might be said in extenuation of the step he has now taken. But all accounts go to show that his springs of action are not to be sought in enlightened instincts, and that whatever advances his subjects make are made in spite of him. The spectacle of such a sovereign protected by a body-guard of foreign mercenaries is considerably more shocking than was his flight to the sanctuary of the Russian Legation, and if his people do not soon protest very vigorously against this new state of affairs, we shall be much surprised.

Sept. 22.

Of course that company of castaways picked up in the highways and byways of Shanghai to guard the Imperial Personage of Korea, has already created a "situation" in the little capital. We all expected as much. But we were not wise enough to foresee the source from which the first protest would come. When the Korean Government addressed to Mr. de Speyer that naïvely sarcastic despatch thanking Russia for having, in the space of three or four months, taught Korea how to take care of herself single-handed, it assured him that, in dispensing with the service of his nationals, the country intended thereafter to be its own protector. Mr. de Speyer's successor has now found his opportunity for a Roland. He has blandly asked the Korean Government whether its method of protecting itself is to organise a palace guard of foreigners. At the same time, the Independence Club has taken the field and is clamouring for the dismissal of the aliens. The members think that the Emperor can trust his own people to guard his person. Perhaps they think also that if he can not, he has no business to occupy the throne. All these things have greatly perturbed the Ministers of State. After a hasty meeting they have addressed to the sovereign a recommendation that Mr.

Greathouse's services should be dispensed with, and the Shanghailanders sent back to their settlement. A telegram says that the guards were engaged for a year at a salary of $70 a month, so the little freak will cost about twenty-six thousand dollars. We are sorry that the crisis should have come so precipitately, for it must have proved very interesting to observe what kind of training and organization Mr. Greathouse would adopt with his Shanghai recruits in order to qualify them for preventing the Emperer's cooks from putting poison into the Imperial coffee.

THE SÖUL-FUSAN RAILWAY.

"We have obtained the concession for the Söul-Fusan Railway, but how are we going to build it?" None of our readers will be surprised to hear that the Japanese are beginning to ask themselves that question. A railway built with capital borrowed at ■ or 10 per cent. is not a rosy-looking enterprise, and it is certain that funds can not be obtained in Japan at a smaller figure. Indeed, we are inclined to pronounce it certain that funds cannot be obtained in Japan at any figure, if the matter is to be treated on a purely business footing. There is, however, a political element which may lend special attractions to the affair. If the Japanese do not build the line, somebody will, and that would be a bitter pill. There is talk of a Government — Japanese Government — guarantee, and even of a loan from the Treasury. A guarantee from the Korean Government, if it were worth anything, or a loan from the Korean Treasury, if it had anything to lend, would be in order; but that a State should pledge the public credit, or lend the public money, on behalf of a railway constructed in a foreign country, where it has no sort of Administrative control — that is a novel departure in finance. We presume that the Japanese Government is incomparably more anxious to have the Formosan railway built than the Söul-Fusan line, yet the Treasury in Tokyo does not see its way to assisting the former project directly. Impecuniosity is the heaviest possible kind of mill-stone that can be tied round the neck of an ambitious country. Is Japan impecunious? Just fourteen years ago, when she was beginning to fix large sums of floating capital in railways, we had the temerity to predict that she would soon find herself embarrassed, as other countries behaving similarly, though with more apparent warrant, had done in many cases. We do not pretend that the prediction is verified by present events, for the truth is that we expected it to be verified ten years ago. Nothing has surprised us more, and surprised other observers also, we make no doubt, than the financial staying power that Japan has exhibited. Where did she find the many millions that she has spent upon railways, public works, and industrial enterprises of all kinds during the past eighteen years? It seemed again and again that she had reached the bottom of her purse, yet new depths always presented themselves to be explored. However, the end really appears to have come now, and the question she has to answer is, whether to sit down and recover breath—in other words, wait until the returns from her various undertakings roll up into figures sufficient for a new departure,—or to convert some of her assets into cash and continue her progress uninterruptedly. It is possible, no doubt, to discover ■ great many objections to Count Itagaki's railway-purchase programme, yet it is based on a pressing necessity—the necessity of recovering some of the big sums that the country has converted into fixed capital.

RAILWAY CONCESSIONS IN CHINA.

To the journalistic assailants of British policy in the Far East, we strongly recommend a perusal of the speech delivered by Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords on the 1st of August. His lordship said, in effect:—"It is all very fine to cry out because railway concessions are not obtained by British subjects, but in order that such an outcry may have any warrant, there must be British subjects seeking concessions. Where are they? They have no existence. Show me any British capitalist, or body of capitalists, seeking to invest money in Chinese railways. There is one railway, and only one, for which a preliminary concession has been obtained by a British syndicate, but the details are not yet arranged. The fact is that British capitalists have made it a rule not to build railways in foreign countries, even in India, without obtaining a guarantee from the Government of the country. China will not give such a guarantee. Is England to give it? Let us not be agitated or excited. When profitable enterprises are on the tapis, we shall get our share of them. Meanwhile, are we to insist that other nationals shall not spend their money upon railways in China simply because we are unwilling to spend our own? Experience does not show that the mere fact of financing and managing a railway carries any political power over the country traversed by it, and if other people ignore the lessons of experience, that is their look out."

THE URBAN LANDS.

The strongest protest yet made against the Cabinet's intention of increasing the Urban Land Tax appears in the columns of the Mainichi Shimbun. Almost every one of the arguments adduced apply, however, with equal force to the Rural Land Tax, which the same journal is in favour of increasing. The Mainichi will doubtless explain this seeming contradiction by saying that it does not oppose all increase of the Urban Land Tax, but only condemns the proposed rate of increase, which it understands to be 350 per cent. We fully appreciate that distinction, but nevertheless regret that a journal which has hitherto maintained such ■ sound position should now employ reasons which may be turned against itself. What is the good of saying that the urban building lands are not now held by the men who owned them thirty years ago; that during that time they have frequently changed hands at ever increasing prices; that their market value has depended, to ■ certain extent, upon the smallness of the tax to which they were liable; and that their holders will be seriously embarrassed if the rate is now suddenly and radically raised? Such reflections are equally cogent in the case of agricultural land, and can be at once met by the simple rejoinder that individuals have hitherto profited solely by the unearned increment, whereas the State is undoubtedly entitled to a due share in it. Nor do we appreciate our contemporary's contention that the value of land for purposes of mortgage will be so greatly affected by the change of tax as to compel the mortgagees to call for further security, with the result that great tracts of urban lands will fall into the hands of millionaires like the Mitsu Bishi and the Mitsui. Surely that is a mere chimera. The average rate of the urban land tax at present being 5.15 yen per acre, it follows that the assessed value of the land for taxation purposes is 51.50 yen per tan, or a little over 17 sen per tsubo, and that the tax is 43 sen, approximately, per 100 tsubo. Suppose that the tax is raised to 1.50 yen per 100 tsubo, which would be the figure on the Mainichi Shimbun's assumption of an increase of 350 per cent. Can any one seriously assert that the mortgageable value of the land would be appreciably affected? A hundred tsubo of urban land, if it were worth only 10 yen per tsubo, would still represent a thousand yen, and no one lending money on it as security would care two straws whether the tax on it were 43 sen or 1½ yen annually. The Mainichi appeals much more strongly to our intelligence when it points out that to raise the rate of the land tax in the case of towns like Kanazawa in Kaga, Tottori in Inaba, and Matsumoto in Shinano as much as it is raised in Tokyo, Osaka, and Kyoto would be an injustice, for the former places owed their old prosperity to feudal conditions, and have now fallen into a state of comparative decay. The truth is that what the country needs for taxation purposes is re-assessment. The average assessed value of agricultural lands throughout the empire for taxation purposes is now 32.80 yen per tan, yet we know of no places—except districts specially liable to inundations—where rice land can be bought for less than 300 yen per tan. Re-assessment on some such principle as one fourth of the average market value of all the land, rural and urban, during the past five years, would be the only fair method of procedure. It would probably have the effect of doubling the total yield of tax, though the rate would be, not 2½ per cent. of the value of the land, as at present it nominally is, but ½ per cent.

DISTRESSED FARMERS.

The Aketo Division of Saitama Prefecture sent to Tokyo a deputation of ■ hundred farmers, who presented themselves at the Home Office on the 16th instant and asked to see Count Itagaki. The Count happened to be just then delivering a speech to the meeting of prison officials, so the farmers had to content themselves with seeing the Vice-Minister. They had come to talk about the storm of the 7th instant and the floods that followed it. Their lands, they said, had been completely inundated and all their crops destroyed. It would be impossible for them to pay any taxes this season, and they begged to be excused. They asked, also, to have the source of their trouble removed by building an embankment to restrain the waters of the Tone River. Unless that were done, they must anticipate a perpetual repetition of these calamities, and the Government need not expect to get any taxes. They are practical folk, these Saitama farmers.

EDUCATION IN JAPAN.

The twenty-fourth annual report of the Minister of State for Education is now issued. It relates to the year 1896, and is thus, as usual, considerably belated. We see no reason for the delay; no reason why very simple statistics and still simpler comments relating to the year 1896 should not be placed in the hands of the public until September, 1898. If this report related to 1897, it would still be late, but as a statement of educational affairs in 1896, it is curiously behind time. The contents, however, are very satisfactory, in the main. The number of schools increased from 28,228 in 1895 to 28,404 in 1896; the number of teachers and instructors, from 80,342 to 84,014; the number of students and pupils, from 3,802,183 to 4,030,573; and the number of graduates, from 488,304 to 530,207. Finally, whereas the number of children under obligation to attend school increased from 7,083,148 to 7,187,059, a difference of only 103,911, the number that actually attended grew from 4,338,069 to 4,615,842, a difference of 277,773. The cause of education is certainly progressing in Japan, for whereas only 28 per cent. of the school-age children attended school in 1873, the per-centage in 1896 was 64. Female education, though the total figures relating to it are still considerably behind those for male education, nevertheless shows a tendency to advance much faster than the latter. The diagrams appended to the report show that whereas the percentage of boys attending school—that is to say, the percentage of school-age boys—only grew from 40 to 79 between 1873 and 1896, the percentage in the case of girls grew from 15 to 48. In one instance the figure did not quite double; in the other, it more than trebled. As for expenditures, the total in 1896 was 15,526,101 yen for elementary schools—private schools of course excepted—and since 3,872,794 boys and girls were educated at that cost, it follows that the average expenditure per head was 4 yen, approximately; extraordinarily cheap education, it must be confessed. Inasmuch, however, as the average annual tuition fees paid by a child in the ordinary elementary course are only 74.4 sen, and the average annual fees in the higher elementary course, 2.73 yen, it is plain that very rigid economy has to be exercised in the management of schools. Something of this economy is effected by unduly restricting the number of teachers and by cutting down their salaries to quite pitiful figures. Thus, if we compare the number (3,872,794) of boys and girls attending elementary schools with the number (58,256) of teachers and instructors conducting their education, we find that there is an average of 1 teacher to 66 pupils; an obviously insufficient ratio. The teachers' stipends are shockingly inadequate. In the ordinary elementary course the average monthly pay of a regular teacher is only 9.49 yen; some of them receive only 3.50 yen; 12,924 do not reach the 9 yen standard, and 1,444 have less that 7 yen. It is quite impossible that qualified persons can be induced to work for such pittances. We may also repeat the remark made in these columns on every occasion of reviewing Japanese educational reports, namely, that the policy of the Government is gradually killing private enterprise. Steadily, year after year, the number of private schools decreases. Here are the figures for the past five years:—

1892	2,140	private schools;
1893	2,021	" "	; decrease, 119
1894	1,950	" "	; decrease, 71
1895	1,879	" "	; decrease, 71
1896	1,702	" "	; decrease, 177

We note, in conclusion, that the highest salary attached to a professional chair in the Imperial University is 1,200 yen a year. If a professor be also a director of a college or a hospital, he gets 500 yen additional, so it seems that the best he can hope for is 1,700 yen. That is not a great bourne of ambition.

AN EDUCATIONAL TEMPEST.

The Governor of Tokyo has now become a target for the shafts of the agitators. Two or three days ago, he issued what is called a naikun, or private injunction, to the Headmen of Districts in his jurisdiction. "Teachers in elementary schools," the document said, "have the responsibility of furnishing to young people an example of correct conduct, and should make instruction their prime duty. Nevertheless, it can not be denied that some of the teachers show levity of behaviour, and in their anxiety to become public figures, fail in the discharge of their functions and bring their profession into disrepute. Such persons exert an injurious influence on the spirit of the nation, and on its manners. Henceforth, therefore, special supervision must be exercised, in order that the true aims of education may be realized. Any proceedings in contravention of the 64th article of the Elementary School Regulations must not be overlooked, but must be immediately dealt with. Particular attention is drawn to the necessity of avoiding all remissness in this matter." One does not immediately perceive the objectionable features of this injunction. It appears to be a kind of general protest against conduct which certainly deserves to be restrained. Persons offended by it would be simply showing that the cap fitted. But the Opposition journals allege that it is directed against incursions by teachers into the field of politics, and that it is thus diametrically opposed to the recent action of the Minister of Education in rescinding all the regulations and injunctions by which teachers and students were hampered. Indeed, the critics go a great deal farther. They declare that the immediate object of the injunction was to intimidate certain teachers who were fomenting an agitation against Mr. Ozaki's celebrated republican speech; that these persons were actually intimidated, and therefore refrained from attending the next meeting of the Educational Society, the result being that no further action was taken in the Ozaki affair; and, finally, that the Governor of Tokyo, in issuing the injunction, acted at the secret instance of Mr. Ozaki himself. There are here the materials for a great deal of discussion and recrimination, but it is hard to feel any sympathy with the members of the Educational Society. Their divisions and quarrels have become a public scandal, and it seems to us that there is not the slightest occasion to seek any recondite explanation of the Governor's injunction. It finds ample justification in the behaviour of the teachers who belong to the Society.

THE AUSTRO HUNGARIAN TREATY.

Japanese students of international law seem to be perplexed about the Austro-Hungarian Revised Treaty. Some of them say that since the forms prescribed by the constitution of Austria-Hungary have not been fully complied with, the Treaty can not yet be considered valid, and ought not to have been declared operative in this country. Others affirm that Japan has nothing to do with Austro-Hungarian forms of procedure. If the Government of the Dual Monarchy is willing to accept a certain responsibility in order to consult Japan's convenience, it is not for Japan to ask questions. It appears to us that the latter view is incontrovertible. Japan explained to the Vienna Government the embarrassment to which she would be subjected if any delay in ratifying the Austro-Hungarian Treaty interfered with the issue of the year's notice preliminary to the enforcement of the other Treaties. The Vienna Government replied:—"Very well. We will take care that you are not embarrassed. Issue your notice. We agree that the Treaty shall go into operation from July 17th, 1899, but we ask you to defer the enforcement of the new Tariff until January 1st, because we believe that before that time the Austrian Reichsrath will have ratified the Treaty as the Hungarian Reichstag has done already." Surely it would have been extravagant on Japan's part to say:—"Yes, that is very kind and very agreeable, but how are you going to do it? We must take care that you do not behave unconstitutionally, or neglect any of the forms prescribed by your own laws." The Austro-Hungarian Government would have justly and properly told Japan to mind her own business; a recommendation which might be usefully addressed to certain Japanese publicists at the present moment. We observe that the International Law Society (Kokusonhoa-Gakkai) intends to make the matter a subject of discussion at its next meeting; a superfluous performance in our opinion.

COUNT OKUMA'S RETORT.

The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce gave, on the 17th instant, one of those afternoon réunions which are so fashionable now-a-days. Count Okuma attended, and was as usual a centre of attraction, full of geniality, wit, and sympathetic interest in everybody's hobby. But he seasoned his talk with some significant rebukes to the folks who would drive the coach of State along such wonderful routes if only the reins were placed in their hands. They accused the Cabinet of being in its dotage, he said, but in his opinion the charge might be preferred with greater justice against the people at large. Nothing gave such a wholesome impetus to the machinery of government as a pressure from public opinion. Lord Salisbury, for example, was an old man, and perhaps, if left to himself, the prudence incidental to advanced years might too much tinge his foreign policy. But the nation took care that there should be nothing of that kind. He was kept well up to the mark by the activity and vigour of public opinion. Could it be truly said that such was the case in Japan?

THE PEERS.

The Peers are attracting a great deal of attention. Viscount Tani, who, as a very prominent member of the House, ought to be an authority on its mood, predicts that it will be found in strong opposition to the Cabinet next session. Of course some people welcome that prospect with considerable pleasure. They pat the House on the back, so to speak, and tell it that a grave duty devolves on it at this crisis of the nation's career, for since the Ministry's supporters in the Lower House have a monopoly of power, the Peers alone remain to put a check on them. It is precisely to meet such a contingency that the bicameral system exists, they say, and the Peers must stand to their guns in the best interests of the State. Very different is the view taken by others—the Jiji Shimpo, for example. That journal declines to give the Peers any credit for desiring to restore the balance of power disturbed by the immense preponderance of pro-Cabinet members among the Representatives. It says that they are swayed solely by conservative hatred of party government, and it sneers openly at the idea of noblemen attempting to meddle in financial matters, like the Budget. The Peers have inherited their wealth, says the Jiji. They have not themselves had anything to do with its acquisition, and they know nothing whatever about ways and means. If they want to have a voice in financial affairs, they must first resign their wealth, or, should that sacrifice seem too severe, they must resign their titles. Such criticism is really too silly to be worth quoting did it not illustrate a comment which we have had occasion to make more than once of late, namely, that the Jiji Shimpo's columns are losing the fine flavour of practical common sense which used to make them such agreeable reading. Its writing certainly will not tend to conciliate the Peers, and we can scarcely believe that it is inspired by any purpose of the kind.

FOREIGNERS IN JAPANESE PRISONS.

It has now been finally decided, we understand, that what is called kojin-teki no taigu, or individual treatment, shall be adopted hereafter in Japanese jails. The meaning of "individual treatment" is that a prisoner's manner of life, so far as concerns food, raiment, sleeping accommodation, &c., shall be adapted to his previous habits. All Japanese will continue, of course, to be treated according to Japanese customs, but when a foreign prisoner is in question, care will be taken that his diet, dress, and general accomodation are not such as to augment the degree of his punishment. In short, an European or American will have meat and bread for his meals and a bedstead to lie on. As a matter of fact there never was any room for doubt that this system would be adopted. The ding-dong agitation carried on by indiscreet foreigners has only had the effect of offending some Japanese and thus rendering the Government's task not so easy as it would otherwise have been.

ALCOHOL SMUGGLING.

The statement that six of the eight cargo-boats recently engaged in carrying smuggled alcohol from Yokohama to Tokyo had put into Kanagawa owing to stress of weather, and there been seized by the police, turns out to be an error. The whole fleet of eight made its way to Tokyo, and six managed to land their cargo without attracting any attention. It is now alleged, indeed, that there were originally 17 boats, but that 9 of them did not succeed in getting out of Yokohama owing to some irregularity in their documents, though no suspicion existed that they were engaged in smuggling. The Jiji Shimpo writes at considerable length on the subject. It alleges that these evasions of the internal-revenue tax are very numerous, the average being about 23,000 or 24,000 cases a month, but we are unable to understand clearly the processes by which the thing is supposed to be managed, and the figure here stated must obviously be a pure conjecture. It is all events pleasant to find that no charge of complicity is made against foreigners. The Japanese do the trickery by devices entirely their own. Sometimes, when hard pressed, they are supposed to have recourse to the manœuvre of pretending that the alcohol is foreign property, but there is no suggestion that they do so with the connivance of foreigners.

The more we learn of the recent "alcohol-smuggling" affair, the less explicable does it appear. One would have supposed from reading the first accounts that the "smuggling" meant an attempt to evade the payment of import duties, and that foreign merchants were more or less privy to it. But it now turns out that there is no question whatever of customs duties or of foreign connivance. The alcohol had been duly passed through the customs, and its European or American importers were altogether blameless. Where, then, did the smuggling come in? The latest version of the incident is that the Japanese who had the alcohol conveyed secretly by boat to Tokyo were seeking to avoid the business tax. That impost amounts, it is said, to 25 yen on each koku of alcohol, so there is a solid reason for trying to escape the payment. Yes, but then the query presents itself, how would a scheme to evade payment of the business tax have been facilitated by secretly transporting the alcohol to Tokyo, unless it was intended for sale by unlicensed dealers, and nothing of that kind is suggested. We failed to see, too, what title the police had to interfere with the transport, except in so far as was necessary to assure themselves that the goods were consigned and delivered to legitimate dealers. The vernacular newspapers refer to the matter at some length, but do not explain the exact nature of the offence committed.

THE MONEY MARKET.

The Bank of Japan's policy may claim the approval of success, which is the most convincing endorsement that events can offer. At one period in 1897, its issue of notes over and above the legal limit aggregated 55 million yen, and there can be no doubt that the liberal assistance then extended by it to the mercantile and manufacturing classes greatly mitigated their sufferings, if it did not avert actual disaster. But when the crisis had passed, the Bank gradually raised the rate of interest, and was thus able to recover its loans, so that, in the middle of last week, it had not a yen circulating above the limit, and on the 15th instant the Minister of Finance was able to withdraw the permission for extra-limit issues. The Bank's paper now in circulation amounts to 169,900,000 yen, and its gold reserves to 89,400,000 yen, so that its position is very satisfactory. Under the circumstances, several of the vernacular newspapers advocate an immediate reduction of the rate of interest, but others wisely point out that it would be imprudent to take a step of that nature at the first manifestation of favourable conditions. There is no sufficient guarantee that a necessity to raise the rate again may not present itself within the next few months. Better wait a little, and see how things shape themselves.

Last year, when the pressure in the money market was very severe, the Government authorized the Bank of Japan to issue notes in excess of the legal limit—85 million yen—and the public availed itself so largely of the permission that, at one time, the Bank exceeded the limit by as much at 55 millions. During the present year, however, the financial condition of the commercial and industrial classes has evidently become easier, so that the Bank has been able gradually to call in its advances, and a few days ago the newspapers announced that the super-limit issue had dwindled to 4½ million yen. The Government apparently thinks that no further occasion exists for exceptional accommodation, and on the 15th instant the Bank's permission to exceed the legal limit was withdrawn. There is a general expression of satisfaction that things have returned to their normal condition. We may expect, now, that rates of interest will begin to fall.

JAPAN'S ANSWER TO RUSSIA.

The Japanese Government have replied to the Czar's disarmament proposal. They declare it to be a proposal eminently conducive to the benefit of mankind and to the cause of morality, and they therefore express their cordial endorsement. It is understood that Germany, France, Italy, and Great Britain have addressed similar answers to St. Petersburg. Of course these interchanges of courteous expressions do not bind any one to anything. It remains now to be seen what steps the Czar will take to bring about the discussion of his project. We have no more conception that such an end can be achieved by such means than we have of the Pyramids being sent round the world by parcel's post.

THE LATE DR. VERBECK.

Our readers will be pleased to learn that a number of Japanese have formed an association for the purpose of raising funds to erect a monument to the late Dr. Verbeck. The monument will be set up in Aoyama Cemetery, where Dr. Verbeck's remains lie buried, and it is the intention of the association to send the surplus, should there be any, to his widow. This is a graceful act, and assuredly well deserved, for Dr. Verbeck may truly be said to have devoted his life to the service of Japan.

POLITICS.

Rumour says that the Shimbashi Club is proving a painful thorn in the Cabinet's side, but truly if even a fraction of the assertions made by rumour within the past few weeks were true, the Ministry should have been in hopeless confusion long ago. The Shimbashi Club consists of men that represent the very cream of the Constitutional Party; men like Messrs. Taguchi, Shimada, Abe, Kojima, Nakano, Sakuma, and so forth. These are not office-hunters. They are genuine publicists who may be credited with honest anxiety to see the affairs of the Administration put in order. It appear that they are not at all content with the prospect of administrative reform now in view. On the 13th instant, they held a meeting, and appointed a committee of seven to approach the Ministry. No definite instructions were given to the committee; the members were authorized to use their own discretion. One of the Tokyo journals says that they have taken vigorous advantage of the latitude thus left to them, and that, visiting Count Okuma, they told him, in effect, that they did not care to be the friends of politicians who, when in office, shrink from the responsibilities to which they pledged themselves out office, and that unless radical reforms were instituted, they would range themselves against the Cabinet. We think that stories of that kind must be largely discounted. There are numbers of agitators who make it their business at present to create a belief that the Cabinet is disappointing the nation's expectations, unworthy to be trusted, and incapable of holding together. Their persistence will have some reward, for a certain class of persons can always be persuaded to credit a statement if they hear it sufficiently often.

A FUTURE PARTY LEADER.

It is impossible to doubt that Mr. Shimada Saburo will figure, one of these days, as a powerful and independent party leader. The differences between his views and those of many of the men with whom he has hitherto worked in concert are becoming so accentuated that his continued allegiance to the Constitutional Party can not be of long duration. He is in favour of increasing the Land Tax. He is in favour of reducing the post-bellum programme of army expansion. He is in favour of drastic administrative reforms. What is more, he has a strong following, organized as the "Nippon Club," and he is now openly speaking in terms almost contemptuous of the Cabinet's want of courage, sincerity, and thoroughness. The position assumed by him, the position which, together with five other representatives of the Club, he has been commissioned to urge upon the Ministers, is that they must take their courage in both hands, recognising that so long as they waste their time and energy trying to trim their sails to all the breezes of opinion blowing among their political followers, they can never hope to make any port. Mr. Shimada says that the Club Committee, of which he is a member, refrains from publishing any statement of the views which it is commissioned to urge upon the Cabinet, but there is no difficulty in inferring, from the remarks which he does allow to be published, that a considerable reduction of the military establishment is prominent among those views; or in deducing, from the historical precedents which he quotes, that he counsels a determined course even at the cost of a rupture with the Liberals. Among recent political events we see none so serious as the procedure of Mr. Shimada and of the Club which he leads.

ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM.

It is alleged by the Nippon that the much-talked-of and long-waited-for draft of Administrative reform has been completed; that it is called Kwansei-Kaikaku-an; that its examination and revision by the Legislative Bureau have been completed; that it has been returned to the Cabinet and will be finally passed in review by the latter to-day (Tuesday); that it will then be submitted for the Emperor's approval; that it will probably be published on the 28th or 29th instant; and that its contents are still secret but have been privately ascertained to be broadly as follows:—

1. Bureaux to be abolished or changed into Sections.

The Official Gazette Bureau in the Cabinet.

The Bureau of Temples and Shrines, the Bureau of General Business; the Bureau of Formosan Affairs, and the Hokkaido Bureau in the Home Department.

The Bureau of Records in the Department of Education.

The Bureau of Commerce and the Bureau of Industry in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce.

The Bureau of Posts and the Bureau of Telegraphs in the Department of Communications.

The Bureau of Superintendence in the Department of Finance.

2. New Bureaux to be created.

The Bureau of Statistics (in the Cabinet), including two sections of Records and Statistics, the latter to conduct the business of the Official Gazette Bureau.

The Bureau of Commerce and Industry (in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce); being, in fact, the former two Bureaux of Commerce and Industry rolled into one.

The Bureau of Posts and Telegraphs (in the Department of Communications), being the former two Bureaux of Posts and Telegraphs rolled into one.

3.—The Chokunin Councillors of Departments to be abolished, and each Department to have an official called Sanyo-Kwan, who will attend to political affairs and represent the Department in the Diet.

4. The distinction between Political Officials and Administrative Officials to be this, namely, that Vice-Ministers and Sanyo-Kwan shall be equally responsible with Ministers and shall be classed as "Political Officials" (Seimu-Kwan), and that all other officials from Heads of Bureaux downwards shall be classed as "Administrative Officials," and need not go out with the Cabinet.

5. Districts (gun) to be abolished, and the limits of Urban Divisions (cho) and Rural Divisions (son) to be increased, the former District Offices to become Prefectural Offices.

6. The result of the above changes will be to reduce the total establishment of officials by about ten thousand; that is to say, twenty per cent. of the present aggregate (50,000).

MR. NAKADA.

We learn with great regret that Mr. Nakada has resigned his position as Head of the Political Bureau in the Foreign Office. Among the junior officials of the Administration there are many men of great capacity and promise, but not many, we imagine, who equal Mr. Nakada in thoroughness of method as well as in clear-headedness. He will be a great loss to the Government, and it is to be hoped that his services will again become available before long.

THE SUGAMO PRISON AFFAIR.

The recent doings of the new Governor of Sugamo Prison, as related by the Yomiuri Shimbun, were of such an ill-judged and even illegal character that we expressed strong doubts of the correctness of the report, and our doubts are now justified by the publication of a very different version. It appear in the columns of the Tokyo Shimbun, and is very much more credible than the first story. According to the Yomiuri's account, Mr. Arima virtually compelled the four Buddhist priests to resign their positions at the jail, and appointed a Christian pastor in their stead. What really happened seems to be that the Governor, deeming four religious instructors a needlessly large number—it must be remembered that the duty of these persons is limited to the reading of prayers and the preaching of sermons—, decided to dispense with two, and further concluded that as the principles of religious liberty were not properly consulted by having Buddhist priests only to minister to a body of men some of whom were Christians, one of the two religionists on duty should be a Christian pastor. He conveyed an intimation in that sense to the Hongwan Temple, to which the priests attached to the Sugamo Prison have hitherto belonged. The Temple authorities replied, however, that without instructions from head-quarters they could not allow one of their priests to give religious instruction in common with a teacher of a strange faith. They therefore withdrew their ministers altogether from the Prison. At the same time the Vicar-General (sammu) addressed a letter to the Minister of State for Home Affairs inquiring whether, in view of the fact that Buddhism is the State religion of Japan and Christianity a creed receiving only individual recognition, it was with the approval of the Minister that this distinction had been ignored at Sugamo, and the two placed on an equal footing.

That is a horse of a very different colour from the steed previously trotted out for public inspection, and there seems to be no room for hesitation as to which of the two represents the truth. The Buddhists, it will be seen, are trying to carry things with a high hand; an attempt which none of us has any business to condemn for its own sake. But we do feel justified in saying that it is an unlovely and injudicious attempt, for, in the first place, it displays a spirit of intolerance which ill becomes any religious creed, and, in the second, it asserts a claim which is more likely to provoke resentment than to receive recognition. We have translated the Vicar-General's words in the sense of "State religion," for that, we presume, is what he means when he speaks of "a public creed." But Buddhism certainly is not the State religion of Japan, and it is not a wise proceeding on the part of one of its chief representatives to take a step which can only lead to an official disavowal of that status. The Tokyo Shimbun, we observe, strongly condemns the action of the Buddhists. Premising that it does not venture to discuss the relative merits of different creeds, it reminds the professors of Buddhism that, from a Japanese point of view, their faith also is an alien religion, and it frankly tells them that the bigotry they are showing on the present occasion is a poor exposition of the quality of their creed. As for the result produced by their ministrations in the jails, they can scarcely claim much credit, though perhaps the blame rests with the prison system rather than with their teaching. At all events the present Chief of the Metropolitan Police, Mr. Nishiyama, is determined to treat all creeds with absolute impartiality, and the effort now made by the Buddhists to set up a monopoly on their own account will not meet with his sympathy.

YOKOHAMA AND KOBE.

The rival claims of the two principal emporia of foreign trade in Japan are beginning to attract the attention of vernacular newspapers. In the Keisai Zasshi an interesting table is given, showing what wonderful strides Kobe has made during recent years :—

Year.	Yokohama's Foreign Trade.	Kobe's Foreign Trade.
1873.....	35 436,622 yen	8,441,869 yen
1878.....	40,410,532 „	12,531,535 „
1883.....	45,297,115 „	12,691,841 „
1888.....	77,360,163 „	42 971,975 „
1893.....	91,514,655 „	81 879 475 „
1897.....	177,537,839 „	162,149,910 „

It seems probable that Kobe will overtake Yokohama this year, and the Keisai expects that the former will ultimately become the premier port on account of its favourable situation with regard to Osaka, which is rapidly being transformed into the great manufacturing centre of Japan. But Yokohama, on its side, enjoys the propinquity of Tokyo, which, backward as it is, remains always the capital of the empire, and promises to be a seat of industrial enterprise one of these days. The Kobe people are now busying themselves about their harbour. The natural advantages of the port are said to be superior to those of Yokohama, but the latter has had the benefit of large expenditures on improvements, whereas Kobe has not received any such attention. The plan now on the tapis is to spend 16,870,199 yen upon harbour improvement. The Diet will be asked to vote State aid to the extent of one-third of the total, and the remainder will be obtained by the sale of six-per cent. bonds, to run four years without redemption, and then be redeemed in eight years.

THE CABINET AND ARMAMENTS EXPANSION.

A recent announcement that the much-talked of Seventh Division is to be organized in Hokkaido, shows that the Cabinet is not deviating in any degree from the post-bellum programme of Marquis Ito and his advisers. The point was for some time in abeyance. There was talk of entrusting the defence of Hokkaido to the colonial militia, and thus reducing the proposed establishment of the Army by one Division. But that change has evidently been abandoned. We read also in vernacular journals that the Budget for next year includes appropriations on account of fortifying the Pescadores and Tsushima, and it is thus a fair conclusion that the full programme of armaments expansion is to be carried out. Unless we greatly misread the signs of the time, this question will ultimately prove the cause of a rupture in the Constitutional Party.

THE NORTH-EASTERN POLITICIANS.

The political section led by Mr. Kono Hironaka, Mr. Okuma Hidemaro, and others, seem determined to assert themselves in a manner calculated to embarrass the Cabinet. They are to have a grand meeting on the 25th instant in Sendai, and, by way of preliminary, the representatives now in Tokyo, numbering about thirty-five, assembled on the 21st instant, for the purpose of discussing a series of resolutions to be submitted to the general meeting. They framed five items :—first, that the relics of Clannism must be eliminated and the reality of administrative reform attained; secondly, that the Regulations for Official Appointment must be rescinded with a view to the wider employment of talent; thirdly, that there must be no increase of the Land Tax; fourthly, that the old lines of party cleavage must be obliterated among the Constitutionalists and thorough concord established; and fifthly, that the Tōhoku (north-eastern) politicians will never rest until constitutional government is fully established. With the two first among these five resolutions the leaders of the present Cabinet are not at all likely to agree.

NOTES ON NEWS.

The Sei-wa (Ise-Yamato) Railway has been much-talked-of lately, and now finally its property has been seized for debt. It was to have been expected, of course, that a good many of the railways projected during the mania of 1895-6 would prove unremunerative, but a line traversing such districts as those of Ise and Yamato should not belong to the category of bubble enterprises.

It appears that trespasses of the game laws are frequent this season, early as the date is. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce issues a notification ordering that strict care shall be exercised to prevent people shooting without a license, or using someone else's license, or employing dangerous weapons in the pursuit of game, or slaughtering protected birds.

Four Divisions are to take part in the autumn manœuvres in November. There ought, therefore, to be about thirty thousand men in the field. The Divisions told off for the duty are the Third (Nagoya), the Fourth (Osaka), the Ninth (Kanazawa) and the Tenth (Himeji). The Fourth and the Tenth will be the army of attack; the Third and the Ninth, the army of defence, Lieut.-Generals Sakuma and Nozu (or Kuroki) being in command. The scene of the campaign will be the provinces of Kawachi, Setsu, and Izumo. According to present arrangements, the Emperor is to leave Tokyo on November 12th; remain a night in Nagoya; reach Osaka on the 13th; devote the next three days to the manœuvres, and return to Tokyo on the 20th.

It is stated that the affair of Chief Public Procurator Yoketa came before the Cabinet in full conclave on the 20th instant, and that the Minister for Justice found his views opposed by Count Itagaki, Viscount Katsura, and Messrs. Hayashi and Matsuda, Mr. Ozaki also being more or less inimical. Under the circumstances no final decision was arrived at, but Mr. Ohigashi's position is regarded as somewhat precarious.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

The Japanese must be a good deal gratified to find that China is really beginning to sit at their feet for instruction in the alphabet of progress. To obtain that kind of recognition from their big neighbour has long been an object of ambition to the people of this country. They knew that for many a day China despised them; regarded them as renegade upstarts; apostates from the creed of the Orient. Four years ago, they had the satisfaction of proving to her in the most signal way, that whatever moral comfort she might derive from her conservatism, its material result had been impotence. It really was a very keen satisfaction, we imagine, and on the whole the Japanese can not be said to have been unduly inflated by it. But what the best of them hoped was to see China make practical and voluntary acknowledgement of her error, as she is now doing. We do not wish to be interpreted as predicting the renovation, the resurrection, the rejuvenation of China. There has been nothing of that kind in the case of any State since the history of the world began to be written, and the one solitary exception to the universal rule is not going to be furnished by a nation whose whole time and energy are absorbed in the grim struggle for every-day existence. But, whatever the fruit of China's new mood may be, the mood is there, in semblance at all events, and Japan would be more than human if she did not hug herself a little and chuckle softly over the news that two hundred Chinese youths are coming in the train of the new Minister to learn "how it is done." People say that when the Chinese Government made application to Japan with regard to this project, there was considerable delay in obtaining a reply, and that the Emperor Kwangsu betrayed some impatience. They say, also, that when the answer did come, it was found to be at once practical and cordial, for Japan promised not only to welcome the students, but also to pay the expenses of their education. We hope she did not do that, for it would have lacked the grace of true courtesy; but it will become her well if she can persuade her own students and young folks in general to treat the new-comers with civility, and to spare them any display of the bumptiousness and self-assertion now unfortunately forced on the attention of the Ke-tojin and the Ijin-papa in this country.

THE YOKOTA AFFAIR.

It seems to be taken for granted that a majority of the Cabinet will give judgment against the Minister of Justice in the matter of his dispute with the Chief Public Procurator, Mr. Yokota. Six to three is the ratio predicted for the Ministerial voting. Should that forecast prove correct, Mr. Ohigashi will doubtless resign. But, more japonico, it is suggested that Mr. Yokota ought to resign also. The principle underlying the suggestion is a little obscure, but, so far as we can judge, the idea is that Mr. Yokota must show that he has been fighting for the right, and not for his official position. Having won the battle, he ought to resign gracefully, thus achieving a moral as well as a practical victory.

THE RECENT ATTEMPT TO SET THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND'S HOUSE IN ORDER.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

NOTHING is more uncongenial to the English mind than a conscious appeal to first principles. We argue from minor premises, we legislate for emergent needs, we scorn theory and look for what we call a practical solution of any question that arises. On the whole we are satisfied with the result; but there are occasions when the method fails; when even reluctant Englishmen are compelled to seek in first principles a basis for action. Are we being driven to this at the present time in matters ecclesiastical?

Our question is suggested by the resolutions recently adopted by a Conference of clergymen, to which we have already referred. These resolutions are severely theoretical. They "recognize the full authority of the Bishop to prohibit any service not contained in the Book of Common Prayer," and also "to prohibit any omissions from, or additions to, the services contained in the Book of Common Prayer." Their character becomes the more apparent if they are compared with the terms in which the Conference was convened. The members were invited "to confer on the limits imposed by authority in the Church of England as to the introduction of certain practices which prevail elsewhere in the Catholic Church." There was a scope here for endless discussion of detail, for the distinctions of common sense, for the exercise of practical wisdom. Neglecting all this the Conference refused, as we understand, to consider anything but an abstract proposition. The resolutions adopted recognize a certain basis of authority. It is a two-fold basis; there is a written authority—the text of the Book of Common Prayer; there is the living authority of the Bishop. They are recognized as existing. Nothing is resolved as to the practical exercise of authority.

We think it necessary to insist on the theoretical nature of these resolutions. If anyone, impatient of abstractions and generalities, should take them as a practical answer to the question proposed, they would be useless or even mischievous. A mere right of prohibition vested in the Bishop would be an absurdity. How is he to know what is being done in all the Churches of his diocese? How can he prohibit what is unknown to him? If his attention is called to irregularities in some Church, is he to prohibit them privately in regard to that church? If so, are they lawful elsewhere until prohibited? Or is he to promulgate a public prohibition of such practices or their like? Is the lawful use of the diocese then to be sought in a mass of negative decisions on single instances? Absurdities accumulate; but all are summed up in this, that any priest would on this hypothesis be free to introduce any practice at his pleasure, and to continue it until the Bishop, his attention being called to it, issued a prohibition. That is not the order of the Church.

The resolutions, then, lay down only a basis of authority. They are indeed elementary in the extreme. They may be criticised as bare truisms. What is their present value? Why are they so ceremoniously enounced? The only possible answer is a very humiliating one. It is that we have lost our hold upon the principle of authority, and, awakening to the fact, are fain to begin a process of cautious recovery. We have to lisp the very alphabet of Church order. This is why some seventy well-known clergyman were gathered from all England to dare the enunciation of a truism. The resolutions have little value in themselves, but they are useful as a measure of our needs.

They recognize, as we have said, a two-fold basis of authority; and first, the text of the Book of Common Prayer. This is paramount; it is held, save in some minor details, to bind even the Bishop himself. It contains the prescribed form of worship which every priest of the English Church is bound to use. It is not fixed beyond the possibility of change; but it is certain that no simple priest has the right to vary it. There is some elasticity allowed in use. In the Divine Office certain modifications are authorized; but they are strictly defined, and the priest is bound to use the prescribed form unvaried, or with equally prescribed variations. In the Order for the Holy Communion, and in the administration of the Sacraments, no variation at all is permitted. But how is the written authority treated? Mr. RILEY has spoken on this subject in the House of Laymen with earnest conviction and with full knowledge. He detailed some of the liberties which are taken with the sacred rite. The Bishop of London, speaking in Convocation, referred to the well-known cause for which variations are introduced. It is to assimilate our Liturgy to that of the Roman Church. We have no quarrel with the Roman Liturgy; we recognize its undoubted excellence, we acknowledge its essential oneness with our own. But the English Liturgy differs from the Roman in certain obvious and important particulars. The attempt to disguise this difference is due either to a foolish idea that the Roman Liturgy is the home of all Liturgies, or to a suspicion that our own is in some points either integrally or even essentially wanting; and that means grave and dangerous disloyalty. But the inquiry into the grounds of variation is needless for our present purpose. It is sufficient that the Liturgy of the Book of Common Prayer is presented by the authority of the Church; we need nothing more to justify the modest demand of Mr. RILEY'S resolution for "a closer adherence to the form."

No one, however, supposes that the rites of the Book of Common Prayer are exclusively to be used. The form in which the clergy profess their adherence to these distinctly contemplates others "allowed by lawful authority." It is here that we find room for the living authority of the Bishop. He has a well ascertained right to authorize other forms. Always existing, this right was recognized and declared by the "Act of Uniformity Amendment Act" of 1872. At one time narrowly interpreted so as to include the use of any collect or formulary not contained in the Prayer Book, the Act, under the guidance of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, has been taken in a more generous sense, and any form of service that can reasonably be desired may receive complete and formal sanction. It is hard to understand how the introduction of novel forms without this sanction can be defended. It is not enough to say that the Bishop may prohibit them; they ought not to be brought in at all without his leave. Here again Mr. RILEY'S motion adopted by the House of Laymen is opportune and moderate in expression. It speaks of "due liberty being afforded by the Bishops in the matter of such additional services as the present and future needs of the Church of England may require." The addition moved and carried by Mr. GEDGE in the terms of the resolution of the Conference that we have been considering was perhaps a graceful acknowledgment of the Conference, but it added only weakness to the motion.

To the position here taken it is sometimes objected that if one Bishop could be trusted, the yoke of another would be intolerable. Services would be allowed in London which would be forbidden in the diocese of Worcester or of Liverpool. We have not patience to argue against this objection. It is a plain denial of episcopacy. To bow to authority only when convenient is the negation of all authority. It would be strange, were it not for the dire confusion of ideas upon the subject which prevails, to find the same man stretching the right of a priest to regulate the worship of his parish, and carping at the right of a bishop to regulate the worship of his diocese. But indeed we believe this temper to be on the wane. The resolutions of the Conference, inadequate as they are, seem to indicate this. The Archbishop of Canterbury, relying on wider evidence, declared as much recently in Convocation. He finds a growing readiness on the part of men who are wholly unconvinced by his arguments to yield, in matters of the kind, to his authority. This is genuine recognition of authority, and this is what the Church expects of her sons, and above all of her ministers.

The improvement is due to a facing of first principles. We are only beginning the recovery of what we have lost, but the beginning is good. It is due also in some measure to the Bishops themselves. They have realized that the decay of authority has been in no small part the result of bad ruling—harsh and inconsiderate on the one hand, weak and indeterminate on the other. A rule at once harsh and weak does not justify disobedience, but it makes obedience hard, and destroys the spirit of subordination. The Bishops promise now more definite control, and their actions promise gentleness and consideration. They have a legacy of many years of disorder to reckon with. They will understand that many things must be tolerated, at all events for a time, which greater wisdom might have hindered in their inception. Fieri non debuit, factum valet. It is not easy for priest or for people to abandon usages which they have followed for thirty years. Such usages may even have acquired a certain right of prescription. But the reins of paternal discipline may be drawn firmly to control recent and future variations, and those who are subject to the control will be among the first to appreciate the blessing of obedience.

The martial mood has revived again on the English comic stage. In The Dandy Fifth, now running in London, a military character sings a song of which the following verse is a fair sample:

So come, you foreign soldiers,
And we don't care who you are—
The Uhlans of the Kaiser,
Or the Cossacks of the Czar;
Our Army may be little,
But you've learnt before to-day
A little British Army
Goes a [double-dash] long way.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

The Tokyo journals have grown somewhat weary of attacking the Cabinet. During the week just ended there was a little respite from predictions of a speedy rupture between the Progressists and the Liberals, and from catalogues of reasons to show the impossibility of the two parties holding together much longer. The principal Liberal organ (Tokyo Shimbun) continues its loyal efforts to restore public confidence by affirming, in article after article, that all these prophecies of disaster are prompted by the wish to precipitate it, and that the party politicians are much too shrewd to destroy with their own hands the edifice of responsible Government which they have toiled for twenty years to erect. Meanwhile, some excitement has been caused by the formation of another "cave" within the Constitutional Party. Just when people were beginning to think that the Kwanto section, led by Mr. Hoshi Toru, was not likely to prove as formidable as its programme implied, another thorn was thrust into the Cabinet's side by the Nihon-bashi Club. The Kwanto-ha's platform, as formulated on the 6th instant, was that the Central and Provincial Government alike should be purged of all the remaining 'clan elements;" that the Regulations for the Appointment of Officials should be rescinded; that the Departments of War and of the Navy should be brought within the same circle of responsibility as all the other Departments of State, and that a council should be added to the machinery of the Constitutional Party. Some of these proposals elicited strong expressions of disapproval from the organs of the Progressists, and since the leaders of the Kwanto-ha—about forty members of the Lower House—are all Liberals, people began to ask whether the elements of a final dissension had not now been furnished, and whether the Liberals were not about to go to their tents with Mr. Hoshi Toru as leader and the above four declarations as a platform. For some unexplained reason, however, the Kwanto section passed out of sight. It will be heard of again, we suspect, but it did not immediately press for the acceptance of its demands. Probably the explanation of its temporary quiescence is that it hesitates to take any decisive action until the views of the Party in general can be ascertained. The Nihon-bashi Club is an organization of about equal strength with the Kwanto section, and it includes many men of great note. It may be called essentially a Progressist association. Indeed we are not aware that it has any Liberals on its roll. Little note was taken of it at the time of its original formation. People imagined that it might perhaps prove a strong factor in advocating an increase of the Land Tax, since its leaders, Messrs. Shimada and Taguchi and Baron Kusumoto, are known to be in favour of that measure; but there was no suspicion that it would be found troublesome to the Cabinet. Suddenly, however, it held a meeting; declared, in general terms, that the Cabinet must carry into practice the principles professed by the Ministers before assuming office, and appointed a Committee to give effect to that declaration. The Committee was not hampered by instructions: its mandate took the simple form of a commission to follow the dictates of its own judgment in promoting the Club's purpose. It visited Count Okuma on the 14th instant and Count Itagaki on the 16th. Fresh in the recollection of the public is the fact that a precisely similar course was adopted by a committee of the Progressist Party last November, and that the result of the step was a complete rupture between the Matsukata Cabinet and the Progressists. It is also very well remembered that Count Matsukata complained bitterly of the breach of confidence perpetrated at the time in publishing a full account of the interview between himself and the Committee before any definite decision had been arrived at. Well, on the present occasion also a partial account of the interview between the Nihon-bashi Club's Committee and Count Okuma is published, before the Premier's answer has been given, so that [illegible] every point. We may add, too, that the language employed by the Club's Committee was at least as strong as the language employed by the Committee of the Progressists last November. There is, however, one difference between the two stories. The Committee of the Nihon-bashi Club have not publicly formulated any cut-and-dried demands. They have confined themselves to a general declaration—a most emphatic declaration—that they expect the Cabinet to act up to its principles in the the matter of administrative reform. Hence there is a good deal of conjecture about their exact aims, and some critics—the Yomiuri Shimbun, for example—condemn them for vagueness while, at the same time, declaring that the sweeping reforms advocated by them cannot possibly be carried out. In order to complete this review of the relations between the Cabinet and its political followers, we may add that the General Committee of the Constitutional Party had a meeting with Counts Okuma and Itagaki on the 10th instant, and submitted four proposals in the name of the Party: first, that the Bureau of Metropolitan Police should be abolished; secondly, that the number of officials should be reduced by 33 per cent.; thirdly, that extensive changes should be made in the personnel of Chokunin and Sonin officials; and, fourthly, that the Regulations for Official Appointments should be largely amended. The reply of the Premier and of the Minister of Home Affairs was that the first of the above proposals could not be entertained; that the second was extravagant; and that the third and fourth might be carried out within limits. It will be seen, therefore, that, on the one hand, the Cabinet is pressed by the General Committee of the Party, and that, on the other, two independent caves have been formed, one (the Kwanto-ha) by Liberals, the other (the Nihon-bashi Club) by Progressists, both advocating changes of an extensive character, but each opposed to the other in principles and predilections.

This state of affairs leads many to predict that the general meeting of the Party, to be held next month, will be a tumultuous affair, probably ending in the secession of one or two strong sections. Meanwhile the Yomiuri Shimbun, which has of late assumed a tone curiously out of sympathy with what seems to be the sentiment of the bulk of Party, denounces the idea of reducing the establishment of officials by a third, and declares that the true object of such a proposal is, not reform, but simply the creation of vacancies for political partizans, and that the same criticism applies to the alteration of the Regulations for Official Appointments and to the proposal for extensive changes in the personnel of Chokunin and Sonin officials. If such things are done, the nation will justly say that the transformation has been simply from hambatsu to tōbatsu, from clan usurpation to party usurpation, and that the Administration is as far as ever from a wholesome condition. Even more pertinent are the comments of the Tokyo Shimbun (Liberal organ). It says that the Party is turning its weapons against its own bosom. The complainants seem to have forgotten altogether that the present Cabinet is composed of men selected by the Party itself from its own ranks. Why did it choose them to be Ministers if it considers them so devoid of capacity and so unworthy of confidence? And what do the agitators intend by their clamour for "radical reform" of the administration (kompon-teki no ka-kaku)? Do they imagine that the public labours under any doubt about their meaning, or fails to see that their vehement zeal for "reform" is simply another access of the office-hunting fever which has already discredited the Party so seriously in the eyes of the nation and in the eyes of foreign observers? Other journals find other epithets to apply to this state of unrest. Several speak of the sectional movements that are taking place as "hidden currents" which will soon throw the whole Party into commotion, and one (the Kokumin), having recourse to meteorological phraseology, writes of a "depression" which indicates an approaching tempest. Is it not possible to have a trusted government in this country, asks the last journal? Nothing can be more despotic, impractical, or lacking in confidence than the present methods of party politicians. They publicly pass resolutions and then they call upon the Cabinet to carry them out, just as though the Ministers were simply servants of the Party, men without any discretionary power whatever, who have to be driven with a tight rein along a path from which they would swerve if they might. Even the provincial sections of the Party show a disposition to assert themselves independently, and to set up their own views in defiance of those of the Party in general. If the provincial sections, in other words the constituencies, can not trust the men whom they have themselves elected as their representatives; if the representatives, in other words the Party, can not trust the leaders whom it has chosen to manage its affairs; if the leaders, in other words the general committee, can not trust the statesmen whom they have themselves selected to be Cabinet Ministers, then the introduction of party government has been the inauguration of an era of anarchy and confusion. Was it for this that we fought so resolutely and so patiently during 20 years, asks the Kokumin?

Recognising that the Government's final decision about increased taxation is now on the verge of being taken, the people whose interests are likely to be affected and the politicians who seek to make capital out of every official act, have had a good deal to say lately. Speaking broadly, the Cabinet's intention of largely augmenting the tax on urban building land is condemned by the organs of the Opposition on the ground that it is, in fact, another way of taxing the commercial and industrial classes and leaving the agriculturists untouched. But there is not much heart in this condemnation. Journals which have all along contended for an increase of the Land Tax can not organise a consistent campaign against a partial adoption of their own advice. They have a more plausible argument—and full advantage of it is taken by that adroit combatant, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun—in the fact that the incidence of the Land Tax in urban districts shows glaring inequalities, much more glaring than anything observable in the rural districts, and that to largely multiply those inequalities, as the Government proposes to do, will make them almost intolerable. If a man has to pay 15 yen a year while his neighbour, occupying equally valuable land, pays only 10, he grumbles, but is probably deterred from active protest by the smallness of the amount. Multiply both sums by ten, however, and the sensations of the 150 yen tax-payer will at once become acute. That is a sound argument, but it would be sounder if it did not come from the mouths of men who have hitherto been willing that the tax on agricultural lands should be uniformly increased without regard to the inequalities of incidence that are known to exist under the present system. On the whole, therefore, the increase of the Urban Land Tax is not effectively condemned. As to the Saké Tax, the brewers are agitating now just as they agitated when the tax was raised from 4 yen per koku to 7 yen. But their attitude is very moderate. They say that if the Government will institute a strict system for controlling the manufacture of what is known as konsei-shu, or saké made from alcohol, they are willing to pay an additional tax of 3 yen per koku, bringing the total rate up to 10 yen. Otherwise they must resolutely oppose any further augmentation of the impost, and, under any circumstances, they think that a higher tax than 10 yen would reduce consumption so greatly as to make the total proceeds of the tax less than they are at present. It is noteworthy, however, that the brewers do not find any journal to espouse their cause directly. Something is said about the unfairness of taxing one class of producers with special severity, but the public evidently believes that saké will bear the proposed rate and that it may properly be subjected to it. The Fiji Shimpo urges, however, that no time must be lost in making arrangements to raise the import duty on foreign alcohol. Even when the new Tariff goes into operation, that is to say, when alcohol has to pay a duty of 40 per cent., it will still be possible to obtain for 30 yen alcohol sufficient to make a koku of "mixed saké." The commonest saké, however, will cost about 40 yen a koku when the tax is amended.

It is noticeable that two leading Japanese journals, the Yomiuri and the Asahi, insist in emphatic terms on the importance of Japan's refraining carefully from all interference in Korea's political affairs. The Mainichi assumes a directly opposite position; but that is not novel. It has hitherto been the custom of all vernacular journals to advocate a strong policy towards Korea. It is not the Mainichi's adherence to that habit, but the two other journals' departure from it, that we find interesting. Their idea seems to be that Korea can not be touched without soiling the hands. The Asahi compares it to a rotten and ragged old vestment which can not be stitched without making fresh rents. There is but one sound and hopeful method of helping the country, namely, to work for it commercially and industrially without any reference whatever to the Government. Railway building seems particularly desirable in our contemporary's eyes. It recommends its nationals to build a line from Sōul to Wiju, so that Japan may have a trunk road right through the peninsula from Fusan to the Yalu. Considering that a French syndicate has already obtained a concession for the Sōul-Wiju line, considering that there is not the remotest prospect of profit from such a road, and considering that Japan is lamentably short of capital to build railways for herself at home, this advice of the Asahi has a fine ring of unpractical romance.

FORMOSA AND THE TARIFF.

The Official Gazette of the 16th instant contains an announcement that the General Tariff is to go into operation in Formosa from the 1st of January next. It is a perplexing notification. We should have supposed that the notice recently given held good for the whole empire. If it did not, if a special announcement is necessary in order to include Formosa, why does not the same principle apply to the Conventional Tariff? Why should this second notification speak of the General Tariff only?

DUPLICATED IN JAPAN.

Nature publishes a letter from a correspondent at Bettws-y-coed recording an extraordinary experience. On killing what was supposed to be an adder, about 38 inches long, its captors opened him and found inside a large toad, about half-way down the snake's interior. It was thought that the toad, whose head was much wider than the snake's and whose body was many times as large as his enemy's head, must be dead, but as he shortly began to move, water was poured over him, and whisky and water down his throat, the result of which heroic measures was that he revived, stood up on all-fours, distended like a balloon, and darted at a stick in a most comical way, eventually disappearing. The correspondent, who humorously christened the toad "Jonah," asks for information as to similar cases of resuscitation, and the probable duration of the toad's entombment.

A similar case happened in Japan. Some years ago the writer was staying at the Kai-kaitei, Kowakidani, when a snake was killed and afterwards dissected. In its interior was found a huge toad, apparently dead, but upon the application of a little whisky, he revived and eventually hopped away as lively as ever a toad could hop, and looking none the worse for his temporary lodging in the snake's inside.

THE ART-LIBRARY PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Mr. J. B. Millet, whose name is familiar to many persons in Japan in connexion with the magnificently illustrated work on this country which he is now engaged in bringing out, has just made an important extension of his business. We take the following from the Boston Herald:—

The sale of the assets of the Art-Library Publishing Company of Philadelphia to Mr. J. B. Millet of Boston is now announced as an accomplished fact. Mr. Millet is the head of the publishing house bearing his name, at 6 Hancock Avenue, Boston, and has now acquired some of the most successful subscription publications on the market. The Art Library Publishing Company for some years gave all its attention to subscription books, and, under the financial support of Mr. William Singerly of Philadelphia, it built up an extensive business. No money was spared to make its plant valuable, and its offices were doing a very profitable business in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Rochester when the failure of Mr. Singerly's bank brought it all to a sudden halt. A receiver was appointed immediately after Mr. Singerly's death, and as soon as it was known that the business was for sale, leading publishers submitted bids, Mr. Millet among them. It is not known what price was paid, but the expert's report submitted to the creditors showed that the assets were worth $129,000. Mr. Millet assumes none of the liabilities, but recognizes the moral obligation of completing the deliveries on the unfulfilled contracts held by subscribers.

The plant will be moved to Boston early in the fall. Among the most important books on the list are:—"The Literature of All Nations and All Ages," "Historic Characters and Famous Events," edited by A. R. Spofford, former librarian of Congress, "The World's Masterpieces," edited by Chevalier Sattain.

No event in the subscription book trade for many years has attracted so much attention as this sale, although up to the present time no public announcement has been made concerning it. Mr. Millet was a member of the editorial staff of the Boston Daily Advertiser in the early 80's; later he spent five years with Houghton, Mifflin & Co., and two years as one of the editors of Scribner's Magazine.

N.Y.K. LINER ASHORE ON THE AMERICAN COAST.

News comes from Port Townsend, Washington, of an accident to the N.Y.K. liner Kinshiu Maru (Capt. F. Brown), which on the morning of Sept. 1st got on the rocks in Puget Sound. She was got off the same day badly damaged.

Captain David Gilmore, official pilot for the Japanese company, was in command at the time of the accident, which took place in a dense fog. The fog bell at Marrowstone Point was the cause of a miscalculation regarding the course to be steered. The Kinshiu was running at moderate speed at the time of the accident. The lookout could not see ten feet ahead on account of the fog. A rumbling noise that came from the first rock touched was the only warning. It was followed a second later by the violent plunging of the ship and a sudden shock as her steel bow shot high and dry on the beach. Fog was everywhere around. It shut out the bow from the

Among the officers and crew there was perfect discipline. There were 192 Japanese passengers on board, the officers and crew of the new Japanese cruiser Kasagi-Kan being completed by the Cramps, Philadelphia. The officers were as cool as if the steamer had been going into the dock. The crew was mostly below when the shock came. They ran terror-stricken around the deck, but at the calls of the officers they mustered in line on the deck, forgetting every trace of fear.

The Japanese were commanded by Commander G. Saeki, who was on the general war staff during the Chinese war. He was then a Lieutenant, but displayed such skill in matters under his charge that promotion followed.

OUR BOOK-SHELF.

Plain Living, by ROLF BOLDREWOOD: MacMillan's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Limited.

ROLF BOLDREWOOD leaped into fame with his first big book, "Robbery under Arms" and in the opinion of many he has never approached that masterpiece. Indeed, of late years, it would seem as if his chief ambition is to make bulky volumes out of almost nothing, so devoid of interest, yet so long drawn out, have been his latest novels. In "Plain Living: A Bush Idyll" he has a story to tell that could have been compressed into half its space and then been fairly interesting. The story is of the goody-goody order—that class of improving literature whose manufacture delights the conscientious souls of Sunday School Superintendents on the prowl for prizes and rewards. It deals solely with Australian life, and from first to last the moral that the author seeks to convey is steadily kept in view. Mr. Harold Stamford, an Australian squatter, heavily handicapped by adverse seasons, has mortgaged his lands and flocks to the utmost limit and journeys to Sydney to make a last appeal for a little further accommodation from the bank. This is refused, and, almost in despair, the harrassed man goes to a financial agency managed by a gentleman who is fond of taking bold, long shots. This good genius agrees to take over Stamford's account, and, of course, the very next day the long-hoped-for rain descends in the region of the Stamford run, and Providence makes things turn out splendidly. Meanwhile Mr. Stamford dines at the Sydney residence of an old friend. This place is described in detail and, needless to say, is a very palace of luxury embellished by artistic tastes. Wealth can purchase nothing finer in the old country, but despite the magnificence of everything Dull Care sits by bed and board with the noble owner. His eldest son is a scapegrace, his eldest daughter a wilful head-strong girl entirely beyond parental control and as full of whims, caprices, and hardness of heart as any bad fairy of our nursery days. The lesson that Harold Stamford reads at his old friend's table makes so deep an impression upon him that when the news reaches him next day of his quite unexpected accession to wealth, through the death of a distant relation, he resolves to keep the matter secret until his children shall have grown to years of discretion, so that the chastening influences of Plain Living may mould their characters into as perfect a shape as poor human nature is capable of assuming. Naturally the idea works splendidly, but Rolf Boldrewood, as we hinted above, need not have taken so many thousand words to tell us so. There is some very nice love-making in the book; some capital descriptions of gay life in Sydney, of plain life in the bush, and also some good character drawing, more especially of some "new chums"—whose perfectly natural foibles and innocent misconceptions are painted in that supremely superior manner that Colonials unconsciously adopt when describing the folks that come out to them from the old country.

Few people realise what it means to be eighty years old. It means that you may have known Shelley, Keats, Byron, people that have passed into classics and legends. It means that lost history has been enacted under your eyes. It means that you have become mysterious, and in a sense a monopolist of the past. Hence much interest attaches to the publication of "Eighty Years and More," the reminiscences of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. These extend from Waterloo to the Diamond Jubilee. She is a great figure in the forward movement for women and author of a History of Woman's Suffrage. Both in England and America she has seen much, and names like Shelley, Browning, Whittier, Garrison, General Grant, etc., throng her pages. Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish this work.

What are Whiddles? Legends, we suppose. Anyhow, Mr. Fisher Unwin will issue shortly a book entitled "Cornish Whiddles for Teenie Time." One of the "Whiddles" is called "The Sea Miest." Giants, witches, pixies and mermaids figure in them. Mrs. Frank Morris is the authoress, and it would seem that she listened to the telling of "Whiddles" when she was a child. Her book is illustrated by Mr. Archibald R. Nicholson.

The author of the ever-delightful "Uncle Remus" has written some "Tales of the Home Folk in Peace and War," which Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish ere long. In this work Mr. Joel Chandler Harris has almost given up writing in dialect. The tales concern a great many varieties of human being. Their locality is the Southern States.

The Well-Beloved, by Thomas Hardy; Macmillan's Colonial Library: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ltd.

"THE WELL-BELOVED" is not a new book, but this is its first appearance in Macmillan's Colonial Library. It is a comparatively short story, and, though of course clever—as any work of Mr. Hardy must be—it can hardly be said to represent him at his best. The hero is an unsatisfactory person, and one gets a little weary of his love-makings. What arouses sympathy in a boy of twenty, fails to excite such a feeling in the case of a man of forty, and creates only ridicule when the subject of romance reaches the staid and sober age of sixty. "Lockesley Hall" would have been better without "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," and if we had finally parted company with Athos, Porthos, D'Artagnan and Aramis in the days of their gallant youth—braving the terrible Richelieu as a mere morning diversion, familiarly chatting with the Queen in her boudoir before lunch, fighting a dozen duels between tiffin and afternoon tea, and spending the evening in a joyous smash of the whole Ten Commandments—we should be better pleased than when we find them twenty years after going through a rather feeble travesty of their old life. Yet it is the same in real life, no doubt: we find the charming rogues, the adorable roués, and the romantic visionaries of our youthful recollection comfortably settled in middle-class respectability as irreproachable City men, High Church Rectors, and Somerset House clerks. They are excellent citizens, husbands without reproach, and the kindest of fathers, but for all that they are not such good company as they used to be. So it is with Mr. Hardy's hero. When he is hotly in love at twenty we feel an interest in him; when he repeats the same process at forty we think he is rather foolish; and when he falls a victim to the amorous fever once more at sixty we are inclined to regard him as a stupid old bore. But the book is cleverly written, and the literary style, being that of Mr. Hardy, is of the best.

CORRESPONDENCE.

INDIA AND THE GOLD STANDARD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—"We must positively refuse to open our columns to the discussion of Bimetallism," said the Editors in England last year, and they still adhere to their decision.

You print, 16th Sept., a voluminous, if not luminous, contribution to the literature of this thrashed out and thread-bare bogey, written by some "Heaven-born" Indian civilian. The small, but well-armed, body—in the sense that the pen is mightier than the sword—to which Mr. Twigg, your correspondent, belongs, has done a great deal of mischief in the past five-and-thirty years and has thrown every possible obstacle in the way of the initiation and establishment of the Gold Standard in India.

When it is un fait accompli, as assuredly it will be, and the story of the ruinous delay in doing it comes to be written and recorded, the Civil Service will be found to be the chief cause of all the trouble. The few thousand Britons who administer the Government of India with its three hundred millions of inhabitants stand comparison with the civilian servants abroad of any country, but on this particular question they have been led astray, they have grasped at a shadow, pursued that Will o' the Wisp, Bimetallism, until they found themselves bogged and be fogged, as far away as ever from the phantom which lured them on.

Under the present conditions of trade and finance all the world over, a reserve of the standard substance appears to be indispensable; that substance, gold in this instance, the Government of India is now engaged in accumulating; it is a task which cannot be accomplished in a day; in the meantime we must possess our souls in patience and submit to the caws and croaks of Mr. Twigg and others who persist in their Bimetalling:

Them to instruct no art could ever reach;
No care improve them and no wisdom teach.

"Gold has its value fixed by Act of Parliament, and consequently its value never fluctuates." The above conception arises from the confusion caused in people's mind by the term Mint price of gold. As a matter of fact, there is no Act of Parliament fixing the value of gold in terms of anything external to itself. How can anything fluctuate in value measured by itself, and that is the only measurement made of gold.

By general consent and for the convenience of all, an ounce troy of standard gold is coined into $3\frac{17}{20}$ sovs. or £3.17 $10\frac{1}{2}$. In other words, an ounce of gold and £3.17.$10\frac{1}{2}$ are synonymous and interchangeable terms. Legislation simply enacts that the weight and fineness of the metal shall be certified, and this is done at the Mint free of charge (vide Coinage Act, Sec. 8) videlicet. ("When any person brings to the Mint any gold bullion such bullion shall be assayed and coined, and delivered out to such person without any charge for such assay, or coining, or for waste in coining.")

All that legislation enacts is merely that the metal be converted into a convenient form for ready circulation, and beyond the conditions laid down as to the weight and fineness of the coinage, videlicet, that there should be 1869 sovereigns in 40lb. weight troy of standard gold at the fineness of the trial of the same of 22 carats fine gold and two carats of alloy in the pound weight troy—beyond this test the value of gold and the fluctuations in its value are just as free from legislative control as all other commodities are.

The meaning of the term "mint price of gold per oz.," seems plain enough, but is misapprehended because the word "price" is the exchangeable value of any article in terms of money embodying the cost to produce as an essential factor, while mint price per ounce expresses the equipoise in coin into which such weight of the gold presented for coining is cast, and has no concern with the cost of producing it, or with the exchangeable value of it.

Yours, &c., GOLD STANDARD.

Yokohama, Sept. 20th, 1898.

[Where did our correspondent find the statement that "gold has its value fixed by Act of Parliament and consequently its value never fluctuates?" Mr. Twigg is not responsible, we think, for such a manifest absurdity, nor have we ever heard it advanced by a bimetallist of any authority.—ED. J.M.]

WHEREFORE PERRY?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Whatever the Japanese desire to celebrate in 1902, it cannot possibly be the fiftieth anniversary of Commodore Perry's advent. That is quite out of the question. Perry's first appearance here was in July, 1853—not in March, as the Mail states, by mistake—and nothing that he then did could be regarded as an "opening of Japan." He came again in 1854, when the treaty was signed by which Americans were allowed to trade at Shimoda, and it may be held, theoretically, that the "opening" was effected at that time, though practically the Dutch had enjoyed a similar privilege at Nagasaki for more than two centuries. It is clear, however, that the fiftieth anniversary of Perry's arrival cannot be observed in 1902, and in regard to the object for observing it at all has been announced. The outcry of those who declare that it ought not to be observed is therefore a palpable absurdity. They set up a purely imaginary grievance and declaim against it, knowing perfectly well that they are talking nonsense all the while. If it amuses them to object to a thing which nobody has proposed, that is their affair; but it is somewhat surprising to find the Mail supporting them by the assertion that their objections are "not wholly unreasonable," and that their argument "will appeal to many minds." Undoubtedly every Japanese may have his opinion concerning the propriety of honouring Perry's memory, but that is not the point at issue. Certain persons are seeking to organize a festival for 1902, which is not in the least designed as a tribute to the American Commodore, and which obviously will not mark the fiftieth anniversary of his coming. Certain other persons denounce the scheme, avowedly because they do not think the American Commodore entitled to respectful consideration in this country. Their judgment is to what he deserves may or may not be correct; but since the idea of connecting him with the proposed ceremony is a fiction invented by themselves, it is difficult to understand how their clamour can be pronounced reasonable. They might as aptly protest on the ground that Admiral Stirling, who also negotiated a treaty in 1854, merits no recognition from Japan; or that Admiral Pontiatine, who followed the example a few months later, is better forgotten than recollected. The one is no more the object of the contemplated celebration than either of the others. Yet, although the Mail distinctly calls attention to the fact that there is no proposal to exalt Perry,—thereby demonstrating the baselessness of the opposition movement,—no one who reads its article of September 13th can avoid the conclusion that the opponents are editorially endorsed. My previous communication on this subject has elicited a rejoinder to the effect that the half-column of "vehement argument" to which I referred represented chiefly the views of Japanese newspapers, the Mail having contributed only eight lines to the discussion. While accepting this statement unreservedly—which of course I do—I may suggest that it is not always easy to distinguish between quoted and original opinions, when the former are not specifically indicated or reproduced literally, and especially when the borrowed reflections are presented in phraseology which has a peculiarly English flavour. I admit that on reading that "Perry did not come here for Japan's sake,—not one little bit," I thought I recognized a familiar hand; but it seems I was in error, as, probably, other readers might have been. There remain, however, the eight undisputed lines; and even eight lines may be made to exhibit considerable vehemence,—as when one of them likens the Commodore's advent to "a dose of very nasty medicine." For the moment, it is unnecessary to inquire how far this comparison is appropriate. To use the Mail's own words, it "is not a question under discussion." If the historical event had been legitimately brought forward for examination, I could comprehend the propriety of debating it to any extent; but in this case it is thrust into prominence on a manifestly false pretence,—a pretence so entirely unfounded that, whatever a few Japanese writers may say, I fail to see why a foreign journal should join them in the endeavour to make the visitation a disagreeable reminiscence. For purposes known to themselves, the antagonists of the projected enterprise have forced Perry's name into an unnatural relationship with it, making him the object of criticism and complaint which the occasion in no sense justifies. The Mail does not hesitate to affirm that the attempt to associate him with the affair is unwarranted, but nevertheless tells the complainants that their contention is not wholly unreasonable, and not only encourages their detraction of the Commodore, but seizes the opportunity to have a shy at him on its own account. As the editor remarks, "Time is not the smallest obscurity." The existing circumstances do not call for any unfavourable comment upon Perry's actions. The Japanese who pretend to the contrary are either thick-witted or insincere, and the Mail, in taking sides with them, assumes a position which, I venture to believe, cannot be satisfactorily maintained.

I am, Sir, Yours truly, E. H. H.
Yokohama, Sept. 17th.

[The idea, as we understand, is to count 1853, when Perry first came, as the opening of Japan, and thus, according to the Japanese method of reckoning, 1902 is the 50th year from the opening. That is easily seen when we remember that 1854 is counted the 2nd year from 1853. As to the light in which Perry's coming and the methods adopted to open Japan should be regarded, our comments were elicited by Japanese comments, and the question whether the latter were relevant or not, had nothing to do with their fundamental justice. We may, without either inconsistency or impropriety, agree to discuss a proposition when it is advanced, though we may deny that any occasion exists for advancing it.—Ed. J.M.]

THE DISTRESS IN HOKKAIDO.

Sir,—I wired you briefly a week ago of the flood that has overtaken us and brought so much suffering. Since then I have been hoping to get full and exact information before writing you. But the confusion is so great in the stricken regions that, though officials were immediately despatched, they are unable yet to send correct reports. However, concerning the general condition there is no doubt; so I write without further delay.

The flooded region is in general the Ishikari Valley and the section of country lying along the coast east of Tomakomai to the province of Hidaka and on the east even as far as Kushiro. The fall of rain was so great and the time so brief that in one place the water is said to have risen a foot and a half in an hour; and the Ishikari river is said to have risen in one narrow place forty feet above low water mark.

With such a sudden and heavy rain it will be easy for you to imagine the havoc made along rivers where such a rain-fall is almost unprecedented. Houses were swept away bodily or swept down before there was time for the inhabitants to seek refuge on high land. Many people were drowned. Others whose houses stood the test were kept imprisoned for one, two, or three days till relief boats could be taken from Otaru and other places to rescue them.

Railway roadbeds and bridges, public highways and telegraph lines were greatly damaged, and of course communication was stopped. Railway traffic between Sapporo and Muroran was interrupted ten days. The new railway line to Kamikawa is not yet in operation and will not be for a month under the most favourable circumstances. The old stage road to Kamikawa is also so broken and bridgeless that even pack horses cannot get through. The twenty-five miles of the branch railway from Yūbari to the main line at Oiwake is reported to be largely destroyed.

More severe even than the loss of personal property and private dwellings and heavy damage to public property is the complete loss of crops in some places. The dependence of the farmers for the long Hokkaido winter with its deep snows and biting cold is swept away at a breath. Add to the loss of crops the fact that much farm land is injured almost beyond hope of reclaiming, and you have a picture of the distress that is upon us and will continue throughout the winter and even longer.

For a period of 15 days relief is being given by the local government. In Ebetsu, 13 miles from Sapporo, some two thousand (2,000) people have been rescued and fed. In the meantime the churches of Sapporo and Otaru have joined forces and organized for carrying on the relief work to the limit of our ability when government relief shall have been discontinued. A committee of these churches is appealing to all the churches of Japan for financial aid in the work to be undertaken. And I write this with the thought that many of your readers will be glad, as they always are in times of [illegible] their contributions to ours for the relief of our suffering fellow men. The time limit suggested for contributions is October 31st. All gifts sent to the undersigned will be promptly handed to the central committee. If you, Mr. Editor, will consent to receive contributions from those for whom it may be more convenient to send in their gifts in Yokohama, it will be considered a personal favour.

On behalf of Central Flood Relief Committee,
Yours truly,
GEORGE M. ROWLAND.

THE DOSHISHA: THE OTHER SIDE.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—There are generally two sides to a question, and the question which has demanded so much attention of late in the press of Japan, the recent action of the Doshisha Trustees, seems not to be an exception to this rule.

The writer of this letter, which, as will be seen, partakes partly of the nature of an interview with the President of this celebrated school, has diligently read about everything that has appeared in English print touching the subject. From the very beginning the thought forced itself upon me that somehow there was more or less of misunderstanding upon the part of the men who naturally would be supposed to know most about it.

As statement after statement, letter after letter, appeared I found the same thing either assumed or openly affirmed; namely, that the Doshisha had ceased to be a Christian school, and, hence, that it had ceased to represent the principles upon which it was founded and the purpose for which it had been maintained. There were other charges and, in some instances, insinuations; but, whatever the complexion of the writers of these letters, or statements, or editorial criticisms, I found that they all agreed in this—that the Trustees had taken Christianity out of the constitution and out of the school, and therefore the case was plain; they had proved false to their trust.

As an outsider but as an unbiassed observer I was puzzled. If this concensus of opinion was based upon fact and was correct, I could not understand, for example, why the Trustees had left intact article three of their Constitution, which declares Christianity to be the foundation of the morals taught in the school.

Leaving that as meant that either Christianity was not taken out of the constitution or out of the school, or the article was left in as a mere blind to deceive if possible the Christian element in this country and abroad.

I was not prepared to believe the latter alternative without further proof, and hence the conclusion was forced upon me that in the minds and purposes of the Trustees the changes made had a different significance and called for a different interpretation than the one understood and expounded by all the articles written in English so far as I had read them.

This conviction continued to deepen, as I have intimated, till the appearance of the article in The Far East by the President of the Institution, Mr. Yokoi. That let some daylight in.

In view of the seriousness and severity of the reflections cast upon the moral character of the President and his colleagues, the quiet ignoring of all personal elements, which from first to last seem to have played so important a part in the war of opposition, evinced rare self-control and a resolute determination to lift the whole question above the heat, misunderstandings and consequent misrepresentations of personal prejudices, antipathies, jealousies, or bitterness.

This frankness and fairness of tone, together with the impression that fully to understand the force of the article a considerable reading between the lines was necessary, increased my desire to meet one of the trustees and to learn at first hand if possible just how they looked at the matter.

There seemed to be no need of interviewing the former foreign members of the Faculty. Nearly every one of them had pretty fully expressed in print his views of the action of the trustees. I therefore determined to see Mr. Yokoi and to learn from himself his side of the case more fully than he had presented it. I accordingly called upon him at his home in Kyoto.

I was met with the utmost frankness and cordiality. Every facility was afforded me to [illegible] statements by personal inspection of [illegible] documents and other important papers. The result of the investigation has been very materially to change the aspect and meaning of the case from what was presented in the articles criticising the action in question.

In the first place, it is not true that Christianity is taken out of the Constitution or out of the school. Not only is Article III. retained in the Constitution, but it is intended to be retained, and when the new revised Constitution appears, which is now being prepared, it will be seen to be there, so that, when legally incorporated under the new Civil Code, the school will be legally recognized as having this article as one of its fundamental principles, and the latter will thus be protected by law.

In judging, these facts should be kept in mind; moreover, it ought to carry weight when it is also known that the Trustees were asked to take out the third clause, but absolutely refused to do so.

Yes, but if the third clause does not apply, or is not applied, or is not intended to apply to any School or Department under the Doshisha Management, except the Theological school, of what use is it? Is it not misleading, to say the least?

It certainly would be of no use, even worse than useless, if it did not apply, as is taken for granted by all the critics, but here is precisely where the misunderstanding has arisen. The third clause does apply to all the Doshisha schools.

Why, then, was the last clause in the original second article of the Constitution taken out?

The last clause in the original 2nd Article was taken out because it was interpreted by several Members of the Mombusho as meaning that the teaching of the Bible and of Christianity was compulsory in all departments of the Institution as integral courses of study in the several curriculums. This being the interpretation put upon this clause by these men in authority (in spite of Mr. Yokoi's repeated statement that such was not the meaning of the clause either in theory or in practice) they deemed it inadvisable for the Educational Department formally to recognize a school of such a pronounced religious propagandism as this clause, according to their ideas, called for.

Opinions will differ as to the wisdom or advisability of the Mombusho even raising such a question, much more upon its insistance legally, but, however that may be, the authorities were distinctly told that Christianity was to remain as the recognized and avowed religious life of the school, that the morning Chapel exercises would be maintained, that the Bible would be taught to volunteer classes in the Sunday School on the Sabbath, that Christian religious services would be maintained by the Church connected with the Institution, and that individual teachers would be free to teach Christian principles by word and by life. To all of these methods of maintaining the Christian character and influence of the School the Educational Authorities made no objections. They insisted only that there should be no religious instruction from the Bible or otherwise which the students should be required to receive.

But has not Government made the Emperor's Rescript the basis for moral instruction in not only all Government schools but in all private schools as well whether they receive Government privileges or not? Yes.

Does not the 3rd Article of the Constitution of the Doshisha Company declare that "Christianity is the foundation of the moral education promoted by the Company." Yes.

How then, if, as has been said, this article applies to all the schools, can it be more than a mere form, how can there be two foundations for moral instruction; the Emperor's Edict and Christianity.

This question can best be answered, I think, by asking another. Are the Emperor's Edict and Christianity mutually exclusive? Is there anything in the Edict antagonistic to the Bible?

The full discussion of this question would lead us too far afield, but suffice it to say that a careful perusal of this celebrated Edict, when interpreted in the light of the Constitutionally granted right of religious liberty, will convince any unprejudiced mind that any Christian school can (in common with all non-Christian schools) loyally and honestly accept the Edict as a basis, or, to speak more accurately, as a norm or standard, for moral instruction in the school, and, at the same time, honestly and frankly and fearlessly look to the ethics of Christianity, believe in them, and advocate them both as a sanction for the various duties enjoined in the Edict, and also as furnishing a broader and more fundamental and complete foundation for the same.

The Government well understand that the intelligent Christian interprets expressions about loyal and filial piety in a way different from that of the thorough-going believer in the old time Shinto [illegible] Christians [illegible] are gradually recognizing the fact that the former may be and is a truly loyal as the latter.

It certainly is a mistake for men who know the nature of the Edict to say that the promise made by the Doshisha Faculty and Trustees to accept the Emperor's Rescript is tantamount to rejecting the Bible and Christianity as the basis for the moral instruction in the school. It is nothing of the kind. A copy of the Rescript has been hanging on the walls of the chapel just over the portrait of Mr. Neesima ever since it was promulgated in 1890. It was hung there not as a mere ornament nor out of respect alone. Whether the foreign members of the Faculty at that time fully understood its official significance or not may be doubted, but it is perfectly sure that the Japanese members understood it to mean then just what it does to-day.

Again, I found on investigation that while the Bible is no longer used as a text book or as a prescribed study in the regular courses of instruction, it is no means an abandoned book or a banished influence in the school.

It is read as a part of the morning chapel exercises in the college chapel as it always has been, at which exercises there is always a good attendance; it is studied in classes in the Sunday School; holds its usual place in the religious meetings conducted by the school on the Sabbath and upon Friday evenings. There is nothing in the recent changes nor in statements made to the Government which would prevent, or in any way interfere with, starting volunteer classes in the Bible at any time in any room for the benefit of any class of students in the school. The Government merely insists that the study of the Bible shall not be required of any student in any school having any connection with the National system of Education.

Whatever else may have been the object of promulgating the Emperor's Rescript, it certainly unifies or tends to unify moral instruction throughout the Empire and forms a standard around which all schools, Christian and non Christian, and even antichristian, may unite, while it leaves each free to interpret, enlarge, enforce, or illustrate according to the light given or possessed by each.

It may be difficult, nay, impossible, for foreigners to understand the unique position which this Rescript holds or to appreciate it at anything like its real value, but one thing is plain, and that is that it holds a unique relation and possesses a very great significance. But certainly it is unfair to judge that the intelligent Christians view it as bearing any religious meaning, or that the reading of it in schools on certain occasions is in any sense an act of religious worship on their part.

But were not all religious exercises omitted from the graduating exercises this year? Yes. How then can that be called a Christian school where the Bible cannot be or is not read, where a prayer is not offered, nor a Christian hymn sung at its graduating exercises? Well, to those that have been used to these religious services in a well-established Christian Community and State the entire omission of them at the demand of local governments must necessarily to be an unjustifiable yielding of Christian principle, particularly when it is done for the first time after a school has had these exercises for several years; but it is a great mistake to represent this change, as has been done, as evidence of truckling to the Educational authorities by the present administration of the school, or as one proof that the change in the Constitution meant the ruling out of the Bible and of Christianity. It is nothing of the sort. The omission of such exercises at all public official meetings of the school is in accordance with the promise made to the local government by the former President of the School, Mr. Kozaki, when the Middle School was recognised as such by the Educational Department.

However much the present administration may value such Christian exercises, as they do, or deprecate their absence, yet they are bound by the original promises made two years ago when official connection was made. Moreover, it should be said—and to my mind this fact has a very great significance—that the real reason for the omission is not because of the Christian character of these exercises as such, but because the Government have rooted out all religious ceremonies, whether Buddhist, Shinto, or whatever the form, from public school exercises where students are obliged to attend or at which Government officials are expected or invited to be present in a official capacity. Yielding, or rather submitting, to the Government in this matter, is thus not necessarily the giving up of any Christian principle though it is a curtailment of Christian privilege.

Furthermore the Doshisha is not the only Christian Mission school that has come under changed relationship to the Government system of Schools. The other Mission Schools that have received Government recognition and privilege have obtained them upon essentially the same basis and conditions, the acceptance of the Emperor's Edict and the making of all study of the Bible and attendance upon religious exercises and teaching purely and absolutely free and outside the required curriculum. It is perfectly safe to say that any such school not observing these conditions or restrictions is wittingly or unwittingly disregarding Government instructions.

Again. The reported saying of Mr. Yokoi that the Trustees had taken down the Christian sign, which has been so persistently and widely quoted and commented upon, turns out to be an entirely misquoted statement, even if he ever made it—which is doubtful. If made at all it was merely used as illustration for the sake of argument or comparison; Mr. Yokoi disclaims most emphatically ever having even entertained such a thought for a moment, much less adopted it or expressed it.

It remains to be seen now whether those that so widely circulated this misleading and damaging misstatement will be as diligent in trying to correct it, a thing they are, in Christian duty, bound to do.

Another reported remark also needs correction. Probably no criticism of the action of the Doshisha Trustees has had so much weight as the remark said to have been uttered by Count Okuma on first hearing of the matter. It has gone round the world several times and is no doubt now being repeated somewhere by some impassioned speaker whose zeal is in inverse ratio to his real knowledge. If ever uttered by Count Okuma it was evidently uttered in view of the representations and interpretations made by men who might reasonably be expected to know whereof they spoke, but who, as has been shown, were mistaken. In any case Count Okuma is well known (at least in Tokyo) to hold views of the changes made quite the opposite to those at first said to have been expressed now that he understands the facts from the standpoint of the Trustees.

Again, it is not true that the present administration has malappropriated the funds of the Harris Science School. As any one can see, who will take the trouble to read Mr. Harris's "Letter of Gift" to the Doshisha Trustees Jan. 9th, 1890, that such use as has been made of part of the income is definitely provided for by that letter.

But did not Mr. Harris make a supplementary Letter of Gift in 1896 which virtually annulled these provisions? Yes, but that Second or Supplementary Letter of Gift was not accepted by Mr. Kozaki and his colleagues for the very proper and obvious reason—among others—that the second letter virtually took the Gift and the control of the school out of the hands of the Doshisha Trustees, making the Harris School of Science no longer organically a part of the Doshisha University—as did the original letter—but treating it an independent Institution subject absolutely in all vital matters to the control of a foreign board of Trustees; namely, the Prudential Committee of the American Board.

Having accepted the Gift in accordance with the conditions of the original Letter of Gift, the Doshisha Trustees very justly could not see their way to resign all vital connection with, and control of, this Department of the Doshisha University, particularly when the Trustees were not cognizant of having violated any of the provisions contained in the Original Letter upon which conditions the Gift had been accepted; and, also, when the avowed main reason and purpose of the second letter was to create a foreign board of Trustees whose main business would be to see that the teaching of Science was maintained in strict conformity to so-called Evangelical Christianity. Such a provision cannot be said to have succeeded very well elsewhere and surely no one could reasonably expect that the Japanese would work any more harmoniously under any such supervision.

Once more and finally. It is not true that "one of the oldest of the Trustees of the Doshisha, one who was not present at the meeting in Tokyo when this decision was made, resigned." The facts are that the gentleman in question did write a letter of resignation, but not only withdrew it when he fully understood the nature and purport of the action of his colleagues, but also approves of the same action in its main purpose.

This misreported resignation has had great significance and has been used with great power in some quarters, particularly by the American gentlemen formerly connected with the Doshisha, not only because of the prominent and influential position and character of the person meant, but chiefly because his standing theologically has been above question; hence when he was supposed to have resigned the foreign gentlemen at once seized upon the report as proving conclusively that they were right in opposing the present administration as unorthodox, for, judging from the frequent appearance of the word "Evangelical" in the numerous articles published by them, especially in their recent set of resolutions, this whole Doshisha question is at bottom mainly a theological one.

One is impelled to ask this question: Supposing this same member of the Doshisha Trustees who was said to have resigned, but did not, but who now stands with his colleagues in favour of the recent change—supposing, I say, he had been at the head of the present administration instead of Mr. Yokoi, does any one really think there would have been all this commotion and opposition, particularly from the American Missionaries?

Happily we are not left in doubt as to the negative answer to this question, nor as to the course of action that would have been taken. In one number of the little paper published by the Mission formerly connected with the Doshisha, a member of that Mission, writing of the San Yo Jo Gakko at Okayama, says: "This school, like the Doshisha, has been passing through a trying experience and has felt it advisable to lower its Christian colours * * * * It has compromised with its threatened rivals to the extent of engaging to refrain from a public proclamation of the fact that it is a school organized and conducted on Christian principles. The conduct of the school practically remains the same as before and the personal influence of the teachers is thrown on the side of the Christian religion. * * *

"While we cannot approve of the present position taken by the trustees of this school and must believe it to be a mere temporizing policy, we appreciate the delicacy of the situation in which they were placed and have large confidence in the high purpose of those who are managing the institution."

Supposing the writer of the above quotation has correctly presented the facts of this Okayama school, or at least more accurately interpreted the facts than he and his colleagues have presented the case of the Doshisha, then I submit that the attitude of mind taken and the policy to be pursued as indicated by the last clause quoted above would have been the attitude and policy best calculated to have brought forth worthy and desirable results in the case of the Doshisha.

It seems a great pity to an outsider, but more so to one who is genuinely interested in the spread of Christian peace and good will, faith and confidence and love between members of different races in this fair land, that a different policy was not pursued by former members of the Doshisha Faculty and Trustees, one more likely to win men.

It seems very strange, for example, that not one of them appears to have felt it a plain Christian duty, before putting pen to paper or rushing into print, to go to head-quarters for facts, or, rather, to ascertain from the Trustees themselves what they meant by the changes made.

Had they taken this preliminary precaution there would have been a deal less written, but it would have been more history, not so much hearsay.

It would not have been said over and over that the Trustees had taken the Bible and Christianity out of the school, for it is not true; it would not have been said or implied that the Trustees had tried to deceive the Educational authorities on the one hand and the Christian public on the other by striking out the last clause of Article 2 and by leaving the 3rd Article untouched, for nothing of the kind was attempted; it would not have been said that taking the direct study of the Bible out of the Curriculum of the Middle School was proof that the Bible and Christianity were no longer in that school, for that is not its reason or end; it would not have been said or implied that accepting the Emperor's Edict as the basis or norm of moral instruction was the same as annulling the 3rd clause, for the two are by no means the same; it would not have been said that the omission of all religious exercise at commencement was certain proof that the school had ceased to be a Christian School and that at the dictates of the Government, for that is not true; it would not have been said that Mr. Yokoi declared the Trustees had taken down the Christian sign, for he did not say it; it would not have been said that the Harris School funds had been and are being "unlawfully and immorally" used, for that is not true; it would not have been said that one of the Trustees had resigned as a protest against the immoral and unlawful acts of his colleagues, for a little investigation would have shown the report to be untrue.

Failing to do this very simple and easy thing

—the method of Jesus, by the way,—men have misunderstood facts, misinterpreted facts, misrepresented facts, and have caused others to do the same, and thereby done a very great wrong to individuals, to the school, and especially to the cause of Christian fellowship and cooperation in Japan and the United States.

Supposing for the moment that the present administration have departed from the faith, as American missionaries claim they have, can the latter reasonably hope to restore these men and reveal Jesus more fully unto them by their present policy and methods, which seem to be so contrary to the very spirit of Jesus, so oblivious of the direct teaching of Jesus and of Paul,* the great apostle of Reconciliation.

Do not let the writer be accused of bias, or of attempting to whitewash the present administration. He has neither been hired nor even asked to write. He has tried honestly and open-mindedly to see matters squarely and all-aroundly to the best of his ability, and has come to his present conclusions very slowly, and, in some cases, against his first impressions.

He freely pointed out to the President of the School what seemed to him very serious hindrances to the making of the School the Christian power it ought to be in Japan; and, were this the place, he would as fearlessly point them out here; but he has "large confidence in the high purpose of those who are managing the institution" and larger confidence in the power of Jesus over these men. The great need, it seemed to him, as he closed the interview and stood in the chapel and visited the various buildings, was not more means and more students so much as a mighty baptism of the Holy Spirit upon Trustees, officers, and students. Could that blessed result be gained it would do more than all else combined to dissipate the lowering clouds of discord.

But in justice he is bound to say also that, as he has read and studied the writings of the missionaries who have so zealously written upon this important subject, he has been forced to admit that their need is exactly the same. Listen to Paul:

"Brethren, even if a man be overtaken in any trespass, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; looking to thyself lest thou also be tempted,—doing nothing through faction or vainglory."

Your obedient servant, EDMUND.

JAPANESE BUSINESS METHODS.

In the course of a consular report on the trade of Amoy during 1897, Mr. Consul Gardner makes the following remarks on Japanese manufacturers:—

The increase in the import of Japanese textiles from 14,242 pieces in 1896 to 27,662 pieces in 1897 is interesting, and raises the question as to how far Manchester has to dread Japanese competition in the China market in future. In my opinion there is cause for watchfulness but not for apprehension. At present it is true that wages in Japan are much lower than wages in England, but low wages do not necessarily entail cheap labour; the efficiency of the work of the operative has to be taken into account. Further the study of political economy teaches us two theories. First, the price of labour has a tendency to rise in proportion to its efficiency, leaving only a margin of interest to the capitalists. Second, the introduction of machinery and labour-saving appliances, by raising the standard of living, greatly raises the wages of labour, even of unskilled labour. Further, it will take a long time before the labour of the Japanese is as efficient as the labour of the English, and in labour I include what Mr. Mallock calls "capacity." I was in Japan last summer, and I gathered first that the Japanese operative is not nearly as efficient as the British. He cannot, in the cotton industry, for instance, attend to the same number of spindles. Secondly, the quality of the management, in what Mr. Mallock terms "capacity," is inferior in Japan to what it is in Manchester. The machinery is not so carefully cleaned and kept in order. Also, in distributing the dividends of the first year's working sufficient allowance is not made for renewal of machinery, and for the fact that profits diminish as machinery grows antiquated. When the machinery requires renewal one of two steps will have to be taken, both of which may be attended with difficulty—a call on the shareholders or the borrowing of money from the banks. The Japanese banks trade on a smaller capital than we should consider safe, and it is possible that when the manufacturers require to raise money by borrowing they may experience difficulty in obtaining it. At present the cotton mills are working at an advantage with the very newest of machinery; it is not easy to predict what will happen when the machinery gets antiquated."

* An exception must be made in regard to a recent letter in the Japan Times by the Rev. S. L. Gulick. If all had written in the same conciliatory spirit the difficulty might have been settled before this.

POISONING THE EMPEROR OF KOREA.

Söul, Sept. 14.

The Emperor's birthday was on the 10th inst. and was celebrated with more general rejoicing than on any previous occasion as far as my recollection goes. There was the usual reception of native officials and of the diplomatic corps and Government employés at the palace; the Independence Club kept open house; and the Peddlers' or Conservative Party assembled in honor of the day. There were parades which gathered in front of the Palace and gave cheers for the Emperor. In the evening there were a few places illuminated with Japanese lanterns, and the explosion of fire-crackers told the presence of young Korea. It was a day of general and seemingly genuine rejoicing.

On Monday afternoon, the 12th inst., the Emperor and His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince gave a feast in the palace; foreign food was served and presumably partaken of freely. It was not long afterwards that both were taken seriously ill; the Emperor's attack, however, appeared less violent than that of his son. The greatest excitement prevailed in the palace, and as the news of the serious illness of the Imperial personages reached the common people there was a general feeling of horror and dread. Horror at the attempt on the life of the sovereign, and dread because of the fearful consequences sure to follow. It is reported that a eunuch and one of the ladies in waiting likewise partook of the poisoned food and became sick. My information is not as definite as I could wish, but the general opinion seems to be that the coffee served at the feast was poisoned with arsenic. It is reported that the Emperor was recommended to have the foreign doctors examine the coffee and likewise send some of it to Shanghai. If this recommendation is followed the results of the examinaton will be awaited with much interest.

In the meantime, and in the absence of any better method, it was reported the next day that the officials of the Imperial Household, eight in number, were ordered to eat of the food and drink of the coffee, and that the result was the same in their cases as in that of the Emperor. On the 13th inst the arrest of the cooks, attendants, and others in the Palace began, and a dozen or so were detained.

On the afternoon of the same day, the 13th, the members of the Independence Club assembled at the Big Bell. The Commissioner of Police ordered them to disperse, but they refused to go. Just then the President of the Club arrived and produced a letter from the Emperor. The Emperor expressed his satisfaction with the motives of sympathy and loyalty that suggested the gathering, announced that he himself was much improved, that every effort was being made to find out the guilty party and, lest their motives might be misconstrued by the people, commanded them to return to their homes. The Club promptly dispersed, but not until they had given three cheers, which they gave twice for their imperial master. The incident is worthy of note as indicative of the power and loyal sentiments of this organization.

On the 14th inst. one of the foreign advisers connected with the Korean Government imported from Shanghai what is to be known as the Imperial Guard. This body is composed of thirty men of five nationalities: ten Americans, eight Britishers, five Frenchmen, five Germans, and two Russians. What effect this novel method of guarding the Palace will have upon the Korean people remains to be seen.

The crops are very good this year, and there is every indication that the coming winter will be much better in this respect than the last.

The Söul-Chemulpo Railroad, to put it negatively, is not booming. The work continues on it, however, and trains are expected to run by the beginning of next year.

CHINESE MATTERS.

The N.-C. Daily News, commenting on Li Hung-chang's removal from the Tsung-li Yamên, says:—There is reason to hope that this downfall of H.E. Li Hung-chang is final, that he has come to the end of his tether, and that he will never more hold office in China. By means of his great wealth and the "double dose of Chinese cunning" of which Mr. Chirol wrote, he has succeeded, in spite of his many crimes against his country and the gross corruption by which his wealth was acquired, in keeping himself in office and power long after the expiration of any usefulness that he may once have shown. Utterly without scruples or principles as he is, even such a small stock of principles as the ordinary Chinese statesman is provided with, it was, as Mr. Chirol pointed out, impossible that the moral revival of China, for which all her friends are hoping, could come about as long as he had any share in the direction of China's destinies. China has the greatest reason to be grateful to Sir Claude Macdonald if he has had, as we believe he has, a hand in the relegation to official obscurity of this politician with the feet of clay, who goes into his well-deserved obscurity "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung."

According to a Canton despatch printed in a Shanghai paper, the scheme of building the railway between Hankow and Canton has progressed so far that it is averred in reliable quarters that a loan for four million pounds has almost been completed with an American syndicate, and that the balance of 12 million taels required has been divided into 120,000 shares at Tls. 100 each, nearly half of which has been guaranteed by wealthy Canton, Singapore, and San Francisco Chinese merchants as soon as the American loan shall have been completed. The head office of the railway will be at Canton, and the proposed line will start from that city, then to Fatshan, Sanshui, northwards into Hunan, Hupeh, and to the terminus at Hankow. There will be two branch lines, namely, the eastern and western branch lines. The eastern branch will start from Canton north-eastwards in Hinchou, Chaochou (Swatow), and end at Foochow. The western branch will connect Sanshui with Wuchou and north-westwards with Kueilin, the capital of Kuangsi. The Assistant Director of the Canton-Hankôw Line, under Shêng Hsüan-huai, is to be a Taotai of the name of Chang.

On the 7th instant the Chinese Emperor issued the following interesting edict:—Owing to the constant complaints which have reached us of the local authorities throughout the empire using the sale of the Chao Hsin Bonds as a pretext to extort money from the masses, especially in Shantung and Szechuan, we hereby command that the sales be immediately stopped. The Bonds were meant to be voluntary, and we gave perfect liberty to our subjects to buy them or not as they pleased; but since they have been the source of peculation and force by some of our officials our wishes have been perverted, and so all sales of Chao Hsin Bonds are from henceforth to be stopped.

A few months ago the Court at Peking received many memorials advocating conscription throughout the Empire. After perusing the various essays, the Emperor ordered the subject to be considered by the Viceroys and then turned to other matters of state. Meanwhile a Censor took the memorials in hand and came to the conclusion that the system could not be put to practical use in China. He considered that the scheme was too wide, and urged instead that each province should organise its own volunteer corps, drilling them according to the Western methods already sanctioned by the Throne, making the members serve a certain time, and then putting them into the Reserve, their places in the corps being taken by recruits, and so on. This plan, he thinks, would bear quicker results, especially as the volunteers could be utilised to serve as garrisons when the regular troops were needed elsewhere, while they could further be used to reinforce the regulars in emergencies. The Emperor, in an Edict, says he quite agrees with these arguments, especially as the volunteer corps could be formed into the nucleus of a huge army in times of need. "This plan should be put into effect at once, especially as regards the province of Kuangsi, where there is a serious rebellion among the Secret Society men. We hereby command that the Viceroys and Governors of provinces put into action at once the recommendation of Chang Yin-huan and report to us within three months what they have done in the matter; but the Viceroy and Governor of the Two Kuang provinces are to be only given one month to report to us, on pain of severe penalties."

The great Shanghai cricket match—England versus Scotland—took place on Saturday, Sept. 10th, and resulted in an easy win for the Englishmen. England has won 14 of these matches, Scotland 5, and there have been 6 drawn events. Scotland won last in 1887. Among the players were several who have wielded the willow at Yokohama, to wit, Messrs. R. C. Fairbridge, A. E. Lanning, E. R. Morriss, J. W. Buchanan, R. McGregor, and A. S. Bremner.

Admiral Seymour with sixteen ships went to Chefoo to attend the races. This, as a Shanghai contemporary observes, was a harmless demonstration.

A question having arisen, says a Shanghai contemporary, as to the practical usefulness of the Director Generalship of the Grand Canal, which has the general superintendency of the tribute rice transport through the Canal and the Likin en route, an Imperial edict of the 10th instant commands the Viceroy at Nanking and the Governor at Soochow to decide whether or not the above post ought to be retained in the future. Two other important edicts were also issued the same day, one authorising Hu Yü lên, Governor of Peking, in his capacity of Director-General of Railways north of the Yellow River, to build a branch railway to the Western Hills, near Peking, the coal mines at which place supply the capital and vicinity with fuel. The new railway is projected owing to the heavy expenses incurred yearly in engaging camels to transport such fuel. The other edict is an approval of the work done by Sung Yü-jên, a high officer of the Hanlin Academy, in Szechuan, in forming a company to exploit the mines of that province, and in also having established a bureau to encourage international commerce. As Sung alone, naturally, cannot continue to do all the necessary labour for making these schemes a lasting success, the edict appoints two wealthy men, Han Tsien and Li Cheng-yung, holding Taotai rank, to assist the former in his work.

The Universal Gazette publishes further stories of ill-treatment and oppression near Kaiping, in the Liaotung Peninsula, by the Russian surveying parties, including the desecration of the Bannermen's cemeteries, and insults to their womenfolk, which caused the Bannermen to rise in their wrath and drive the Russians away. These reports, as the N.-C. Daily News observes, must be received with some reserve, though Cossacks are not the gentlest of people to employ in what they no doubt regard as a conquered country.

The Sinwênpao publishes a special telegram from Peking to the effect that the Imperial consent has been given to the Viceroy Chang Chih-tung's scheme of sending, at once, fifty of his ablest and brightest young military officers to study their profession in Japan, and that the young officers will probably be sent to Tokyo at an early date. In connection with this visit, we also see in the Shanghai papers that the Grand Secretary Sun Chia-nai has appointed a Committee of four Metropolitan officers to visit Japan and examine the schools and universities in order to get information how to manage the proposed Peking University and lower grade colleges. The following are the officers appointed:—The Censor Li Shêng-tu, the Hanli Compiler Li Chia-chû, the Hanlin Bachelor and Imperial Clansman Shou Fu, and Yang Shih-hsi, second class Secretary of the Board of Works.

On the 13th September the following ominous paragraph appeared in the N.-C. Daily News with all the dignity attaching to "leader" type:—

Fears have been expressed by those who know the ways of Peking and of Oriental Courts generally, that the young Emperor has been going too fast for the comfort of the old officials at the capital, and for his own safety. It is possible that the Empress Dowager has been merely giving him rope, and already ominous rumours have come down from Peking that he is seriously ill. It is reported that there is a posthumous son of the late Emperor Tung Chi in the palace, ready, if called upon, to ascend the Dragon Throne, but we trust that there is no real foundation for these rumours.

"The Mixed Missionary Marriage" is still helping to fill the columns of the N.-C. Daily News with correspondence pro. and con.

The Shanghai mandarins recently received despatches from Chêngtu, the provincial capital of Szechuan, reporting the existence of a rebellion in the districts of Tatsu and Tungliang in that province, alleged to be headed by the notorious outlaw Yü Mantxe. Reports, says the N.-C. Daily News, magnify the number of the rebels to something like 50,000, but at any rate a body of Imperial troops sent to suppress the rebellion has been badly defeated, leaving the door open for the invasion of Chungking if the rebels desire to attack that port.

The French director of the Foochow Naval Arsenal and Dockyard is said to have recently presented a petition to the Viceroy Pien deprecating any "further purchases from abroad of armoured or fast cruisers, transports, or torpedo-boat destroyers, and guaranteeing his ability, with adequate funds, to turn out all these ships from the Foochow works so as to give a very strong navy to the Empire," etc.

A Sikh employed as a watchman at the Old Dock, Shanghai, put an end to his career last Tuesday week by falling into the dock and thereby fracturing his skull.

News from Peking is to the effect that the yamên of the six recently abolished Courts are to be turned, for the great part, into colleges of Western learning, and that the yamên of the Supervisorate of Instruction will be the future headquarters of the Bureau of Mechanical Arts and Commerce.

The W. H. Conner, an American barque bound from New York to Shanghai, when about 70 miles north of Formosa, on the 24th of August, experienced a typhoon of great severity, in which she lost her jib-boom, fore-topmast, and main top-gallantmast. The starboard bulwarks were badly damaged and 40 feet of the main rail washed away; the steering gear was also badly damaged. The ship had about three feet of water in the hold, but this all obtained access from the deck, there being no leak below.

The N.-C. Daily News says it is a fact that, with the exception of the now limited body of openly hostile conservative mandarins at the Metropolis and in the provinces, the Emperor's recent exertions for the reform and strengthening of his empire have endeared him to the great body of his subjects, not even excepting those who at present are in arms against the constituted authorities; many of the uprisings being really aimed at what his Majesty is now himself voluntarily granting and trying to compel his officers of the Crown to grant to the people. Should the Emperor be spared by Providence to continue his noble work of reform, few persons will in future be persuaded to rise against the Manchu dynasty, which prior to this was universally believed to be in its last throes.

The Peking and Tientsin Times regards the dismissal of Li Hung-chang from the Tsungli Yamên "as a sign that a very healthy accession of firmness has characterised the British attitude in Peking."

Edicts bearing a strong reform flavour continue to issue from Peking. Among the latest is a command to the Board of War and the Tsung-li Yamên to report on a suggestion of three secretaries of Boards to abolish the Imperial courier post in favour of the present Post Office now under the control of Sir Robert Hart. Another edict approves of the plan of the Hanlin Reader Jui Hsun (Manchu) to encourage the establishment of newspapers throughout the Empire as the best means of educating the masses, and commands the high officials everywhere to exhort the gentry and wealthy classes to embark upon such enterprises with full knowledge of the Imperial approval. A third edict replying to a joint report of the Tsung-li Yamên and the Board of War, concerning the manner of future examinations of military candidates for degrees, according to Western methods, declares that the joint report is not full enough and lacks many essential points of permanent reform. The report is therefore rejected with the command that the memorialists reconsider their report in conjunction with the Grand Council. An edict of the 11th instant approves of the suggestions of Hsiao Wên-shao, a third-class Secretary of the Board of Punishment, to establish schools of instruction for planting and manufacturing tea, and for sericulture, according to the best combined Western and Chinese methods, in order to keep up with the competition of similar foreign manufactures. Viceroys and Governors of provinces where tea and silk are manufactured are therefore commanded to establish at once such schools of instruction and report to the Throne what they have done in the matter. Another edict of the same date sanctions the recommendation of the Grand Secretary Sun Chia-nai to add a medical department to the proposed Peking Imperial University where all that is best of Western and Chinese surgery, pharmacy, and medical practice may be taught to students. A third edict issued the same day commands all high provincial officials from the 3rd grade, or Provincial Judge, upwards, to observe the rule of asking permission to go up to Peking for an Imperial audience, after every third year of their appointment; a rule which of late has not been usually observed. The Emperor's intention in reviving this rule is to give him the opportunity of personally examining his high officials from the provinces in order to see whether they are fit for further retention, promotion, or otherwise.

A new era seems actually to have dawned for China, for Nsing Lu, the provincial Judge of Yunnan, has been cashiered and dismissed from the service for illiteracy and for permitting his subordinates to commit irregularities.

The vernacular press of China is keenly alive to the potentialities of the present situation and follows Russian movements in Manchuria very closely. The consequence is a very large crop of rumours, half-facts, and occasionally a grain of truth. The Sinwênpao states that the people living in the vicinity of the gold mines of the Amur region, who are now opposing the construction of the Manchurian Railway by the Russians through their territory, are some 2,000 odd, miners, inured to all sorts of hardship and rough fighting, and they have been recently reinforced by nearly 5,000 disbanded soldiery, formerly belonging to Tartar-General E-kotang-a's Tartar army in the late war with Japan.

The true reason of this rising appears to be a report amongst the miners that the Russians intend to take possession of the mines and work them for their own benefit.

It is pleasant to find an influential Shanghai paper coming out flat-footed in defence of the British Minister accredited to the Court of Peking. What a contrast to the tone of previous years is the following extract from a leading article in the N.-C. Daily News:—Critics at home are too apt to lose sight of the work done by a Minister, work which in many cases is productive of the best results to our trade and commerce, in the glare of mistakes made by others, but which they are prone to unjustly lay at his door. In the present instance we are quite certain that if the feeling of the whole British community in China could be ascertained, it would be found to be one of confidence in Sir Claude. In conclusion, we would repeat that we firmly believe that whatever successes British diplomacy has scored in Peking are to be credited to Sir Claude Macdonald, but that the ghastly failures which have undoubtedly been perpetrated are his we entirely refuse to admit.

The latest reports from Port Arthur, Talienwan, and Newchwang estimate the number of Russians in the three ports at about 26,000; and over 100 guns have been mounted at Port Arthur. Thirteen Russian men-of-war were recently counted in Talienwan harbour.

The Kuowenpao states that three foreigners have been killed in a melée at Newchwang, and that they were connected with the railway construction, so presumably they were Russians. The Tientsin paper cannot help thinking that a few Russian lives, for which compensation must be demanded at Newchwang, would suit Russia's book rather conveniently now.

"Brownie," of the China Mail, learns:—

That the Friars are leaving Manila in shoals, and one question of some importance is certain to be raised, viz, whether the landed property held by the Religious Orders is in their possession on fair and just terms.

That, as in California, the American authorities will investigate the titles of all property held by the ecclesiastics, and as a large majority of titles in California were pronounced invalid, the same result is now expected.

Here is an explanation, which the N.-C. Daily News believes to be the true one, of the motives which led Russia recently to threaten to demand the cession of the province of Kuldja. Recent so-called scientific expeditions in that portion of the Chinese Empire have revealed that, beginning from the western end of the Celestial mountains trending southwest to the Altai mountains, dividing Kashgaria from the Russian frontiers of Ferghana, the whole plateau or steppe is filled with gold. One of these Russian "explorers," called "Ma" by the Chinese, was so struck with the capabilities of this new El Dorado that he started post haste to Trumtsi, and, engaging the assistance of the Russian Consul-General there, tried to persuade the Governor to grant him a lease of the country. Of course, any "request" of Russia is now regarded with great suspicion by the Chinese officials and the request was refused. The next step was to get M. Pavloff to take up the cudgels at Peking, and his threats of a forced occupation of the country in question during the crisis when China refused to give up the loan contracted with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank for the Newchwang Railway extension compelled the Tsung-li Yamên to yield to the Russian explorer's demand, but with the proviso that the company exploiting the gold mines must be composed as to half of Chinese capitalists and the other half, of course, of Russians. This was the quid pro quo for which M. Pavloff withdrew his so-called demand for the cession of Kuldja. The Russians appear to have lost no time, for at present, according to a Kashgar telegram, a number of Chinese and Russian officers are engaged in marking out the boundaries of their concession, while mining machinery is being sent to the spot from Moscow.

THE KWANGSI REBELLION.

The generally well-informed Kuowinpao, published at Tientsin, reports—says the N.-C. Daily News—that the Kwangsi rebels have begun their northward march towards Peking and that a large and well appointed army is now almost on the borders of Hunan province. Since their organisation recently, the practice of the rebels has, of late, been not to lay siege to any walled city but upon approaching one they generally form an entrenched camp, about four or five miles distant, from whence they issue proclamations calling upon the people not to be afraid, but to go on as usual in their various avocations, as no outrages would be permitted to be made on any peaceably inclined person. On the other hand, a despatch is sent to the local authorities inside the threatened city, signed by the chief or chiefs commanding the invaders, demanding food supplies and money, the amount being generally proportionate to the size and reputed wealth of the city in question, on pain of fire and sword. "The incapable and cowardly officials," remarks the Kuowinpao, "seeing that, by compliance with the rebel demands, there will be no danger of losing their lives, rank, or ill-acquired riches, always gladly accede to the calls made upon them, while the inhabitants of the place, seeing first that they have not been molested by the rebels, and secondly, that their officials have no stomach for fighting the invaders, remain indifferent and keep on the even tenor of their ways as if there were no Empire-shaking rebellion within ten thousand miles of their city!" Having obtained what they demand—generally more—the rebel leaders break camp and take their forces to the next walled city, and so on, ever increasing in numbers, but always managing to keep the strictest discipline, until at last the latest reports show that these rebels, having traversed the length of Kwantung province, are now on the point of invading Hunan, where they have numerous brethren and sympathisers; unless the Viceroy Chang Chih tung and Governor Ch'ên Pao-chên succeed in driving them back, this will be the second invasion, after the lapse of over forty years, of Kwangsi malcontents into the beautiful valley of the Yangtze-kiang.

AMERICAN NOTES.

For the moment there is a lull, in the East at least, in the hue-and-cry after Mr. Secretary Alger's scalp, and the journalists of the States are exercising their Ingenuity in discussing the question: "What shall be done with the Philippines?" But it is not only the journalists who are stirring in the matter. Business-men and politicians are equally interested and paragraphs dealing with the subjects are being introduced into the platforms of party conventions. The Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., after full discussion, adopted a memorial to President McKinley approving the annexation of Hawaii, the holding of Porto Rico and other Spanish West Indian islands, the acquisition and retention of the Philippines, the Carolines, and the Ladrones. The commercial bodies of San Francisco are reported to be firmly of the conviction, that the Philippines should be retained. The Asiatic Society of New York, composed of merchants engaged in Asiatic trade, is more moderate in its expressions, calling, first, "for the retention of a foothold in the Philippines for the protection and furtherance of our commercial interests;" and, second, expressing the hope that "no conditions of peace between the United States and Spain will be concurred in which do not secure for the United States equal privileges of trade in the Philippines archipelago with all other countries."

Congressman Dingley, who holds the position of Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, has confided the following remarks to an interviewer on the staff of the New York Tribune:—

"The question of the Philippines is most difficult to dispose of, and can not yet be reckoned with. It is interesting to note the growth of public opinion all over the country for the complete annexation of the group. From all parts of the country this is heard. A most important point in this connection is the attitude of the religious press and the Christian church, which is practically a unit for annexation. This great element of our population we would naturally expect to find arrayed against a proposition of this character, inasmuch as it comprehends a departure from our established national policy. In this instance, however, the reason is obvious. They feel that it would be a crime to turn the Philippines back to the incompetent rule of Spain. The alternative must be government by this country. The influence of this great conservative element of our population must exercise weight in determining this question of the Philippines."

Senator William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, is quoted as follows:—

"It may be that we do not want the islands as colonies. But we can certainly make them free and independent. To give them back to Spain would disgrace us in the eyes of England and all Europe, and turn our battles of glory into victories of dishonour."

The retirement of Mr. Secretary Day has called forth some pleasant articles from papers of all shades of opinion. The reasons for Mr. Day's retirement from his high office are thus given by himself:—

I can not afford to retain this position. I am not a rich man, and the social responsibilities that go with the place are more than I can assume. Foreign ambassadors and diplomats extend courtesies to me as Secretary of State that I naturally feel called upon to reciprocate, and no man of moderate means can return the courtesies in a proper manner and live on the salary attached to this office.

Colonel John Hay, who leaves the United States Legation in London to become President McKinley's third Secretary of State, has had an interesting career. It is given rather fully in the Philadelphia Ledger, from which we borrow the following:—

"A glance at Colonel Hay's lifework will suffice to show that he is a trained diplomat, as the word is understood abroad, where it is justly deemed ridiculous to entrust delicate and complicated matters of international import to the care of a mere politician or any one else who has not the skill and knowledge of negotiation which come alone from long training and seasoned experience. Colonel Hay, after his Brown University course, studied law in the office of Abraham Lincoln, whose private secretary he afterwards became. Before the end of the war he served as a staff officer under Generals Hunter and Gilmore, and after the war was successively Secretary of Legation at Paris, Charge d'Affaires at Vienna, and Secretary of Legation at Madrid. From 1879 to 1881 he was first Assistant Secretary of State at Washington, and in March last was appointed to the Court of St. James. Colonel Hay has at times acted as the editor of the New York Tribune, and his literary productions are genuine contributions to American literature. The most striking characteristic of the man is his versatility—his 'many sidedness.' His 'Castilian Days' has the delicacy, the charm, the lightness of touch of literary playfulness; his 'Life of Lincoln,' written in collaboration with John G. Nicolas, is a work of monumental laboriousness, which must serve as the storehouse from which future biographers of Lincoln will draw their materials; and his poem, 'Jim Bludso,' has a rude strength which breathes with a certain elemental vigour and freshness. He is a sound constitutional and international lawyer, a scholar without pedantry, a wit, a genial man, and, as Sydney Smith would say, 'he has as much sense as if he had no wit, and as much wit as if he had no sense.'"

The Bookman of New York, in a review of Mrs. Ritchie's autobiographical edition of her father's works, says:—

"It has been said the problems that made Swift savage made Thackeray sad. But the deeper causes of Thackeray's sadness need to be known to appreciate fully the passages of deepest pathos in his writings. The loss of his second child in infancy was always an abiding sorrow, and is described in 'The Great Hoggarty Diamond,' included in this third volume, just issued in a passage of surpassing tenderness too sacred to be severed from its context. But the great tragedy of Thackeray's life was the illness of his wife, which set in after only four years of his wedded happiness. 'I can't live without the tenderness of some woman,' wrote Thackeray to Mrs. Brookfield. And yet this was the man who, before he was thirty, had to face a lifelong separation from the wife he loved and a long separation from the children.

To us who see the years that followed there is a terrible pathos in the wistful earnestness and passionate tenderness of the words, which are taken from a letter just published by Mrs. Ritchie. After the birth of their third child Mrs. Thackeray's health failed. Some mental disease attacked her which totally unfitted her for duties as wife and mother. She had finally to be put under proper care and protection; and the happy home was broken up. "Though my marriage was a wreck, as you know," wrote Thackeray years afterwards to one contemplating an alliance, "I would do it over again, for behold, Love is the crown and completion of all earthly good."

Recent shipments of coal from Newport News and Philadelphia in British vessels to British, Cuban, and other ports have caused comment in the United States journals, some alleging that Great Britain is preparing for hostilities. But these heavy clearances may be ascribed more particularly to the recent trouble in the Welsh coal-mining industry, in consequence of which exports of coal from Great Britain are checked to such an extent that purchasers are forced to seek the American market. American coal of certain grades is said to be as good for steaming purposes as any other coal in the world's markets, and it is suggested that the present is a good time to make this known. Indeed, these shipments are looked upon by some clear-headed men as the possible foundation for a very large American coal-export trade.

Says the Boston Globe:—Now that the war with Spain is over, it is safe to say that when the whole story is written it will contain more singular and comic situations than are to be found in any struggle of its size recorded in history. We have seen the governor of one of the enemy's possessions in the East fire a salute in answer to the guns intended to demand surrender, and when invited to come on board our ship to arrange the terms of capitulation send his polite regrets that his position did not permit of his indulging in such courtesies with strangers. No such amusing farce as this is likely to be found in all the pages of history. Recently we have witnessed the unusual scene at Santiago of the shipment of the Spanish soldiers for Spain going on at one wharf, and at the next wharf the shipment of the American soldiers to the United States, the amusing reflection being that Uncle Sam was paying the bills for both consignments. The situation in Porto Rico has offered even more fund for laughter. Here our grim-visaged warriors move upon towns which, instead of erecting barricades and digging trenches, meet the enemy with open arms, cheer and dance while the bands play "Yankee Doodle," and implore the commanding general to hurry along the stars and stripes to a people who are not crying for revenge, but for more American flags. To add to this comical situation, our soldiers draw from their knapsacks social letters of introduction to leading Porto Rican citizens which they had obtained before entering the enemy's country, and which look to procuring business situations later. Several other strange and amusing features have appeared in the course of our midsummer war in contrast to the dark side of the armed strife.

The trustees of several villages in New York State—Warsaw being the latest example—have passed ordinances forbidding children under fifteen years of age from "being on the streets, alleys, or public places" after the hour of 9 o'clock p.m. from April to October, or after 8 o'clock for the other half of the year. It is made unlawful for parents or guardians to allow or permit children under their care to be on the streets during the prescribed hours "unless there exists a reasonable necessity therefor." A fine "not exceeding $25" is provided for parents who violate this section.

COUNTESS POURTALÈS.

The Daily Telegraph publishes the following in its Paris Correspondence:—

The Countess de Pourtalès fell out of a railway carriage close to the Rouen station and escaped death by a sort of miracle. The lady is the wife of Count Arthur de Pourta lès Gorgier, Secretary of the French Legation at Tokyo, Japan, and was returning on Sunday to Paris with her husband. They came from New York by the liner La Bretagne, and at Havre entered one of the saloon carriages of the so-called transatlantic train, intending to stay for a day of two at Rouen before finishing their journey. As they were nearing the Norman capital the Countess de Pourta'ès, who is about fifty years old, went towards the toilet-room, but mistook the door. She opened that leading by a few steps to the line or platform, as the case might be, and at once fell out. Fortunately, the train was going slowly, as it was entering the tunnel close to the town. Had it been running at the usual speed the Countess must inevitably have been dashed to pieces. As it was, she was projected against the wall of the tunnel, then fell back on the steps of the carriage, and when the train moved away she was thrown on to the middle of the line.

The lady was stunned and temporarily blinded by the blood flowing d from an ugly gash in her forehead over the right eye, but she had not lost consciousness, and soon realized her fearful situation. Remembering that she was liable to be run over at any moment by a train from or to the Rouen station, she collected all her strength and by an almost superhuman effort stood up and kept herself well against the side of the tunnel awaiting help. She was about twenty minutes in this desperate situation when assistance arrived. Her husband did not notice her absence until the train reached Rouen. He had been busy collecting his small luggage at the end of the saloon carriage when she went towards the toilet-room. As soon, however, as he missed his wife he communicated with the Rouen station-master, and the two, preceded by men carrying lanterns, went to the tunnel. There they found the lady, who was nearly fainting from fear, shock, and exhaustion, but still able to realize that her rescuers were near. She was hardly able to utter a word as her husband helped her towards the terminus, where a doctor was in waiting. The medical man gave a favourable opinion as to the condition of the Countess, and said that he was chiefly suffering from the shock, the injury to her forehead being comparatively slight. It is fully expected that after a few days' complete rest at Rouen the Countess de Pourtales will be able to return to her numerous friends in Paris.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A Hongkong telegram that appears in the Osaka Mainichi says that 300 insurgents in Kwang-si, including several ringleaders, have been executed.

The German Consul in Yokohama has received information from the Governor-General of Kiao-chou to the effect that on the 2nd instant the port was opened to general trade.

Telegraphic advices to London dated the 22nd ult. state that the steamer Pectan sank in the Mediterranean after being in collision with the French steamer Orvontia. The crew of the Pectan were landed at Algiers.

A member of the Orange Free State Volksraad has objected to a vote for providing the artillery with new barracks because he does not like the idea of pampering soldiers by giving them "large airy buildings." He added that when young he wore no socks and no shirt, and was never ill. "When I got on in life," he said, "I indulged in those luxuries, and now I find I am never well." A veritable Mr. Bounderby.

The Ladies' Benevolent Association beg to acknowledge the receipt of $178.15, the proceeds of the recent entertainment given at the Public Hall in aid of their funds, and to tender their thanks to those who kindly gave their services at the performance, also to Messrs. Mourrie & Co. for the loan of a piano, and Messrs. Arthur and Bond for the carved wood furniture.

The repairs to the iron railway bridge over the Banyu River, which was damaged by the storm, were completed on Saturday and a trial trip across it was made. Through traffic on the Tokaido line is now resumed. Trains will not for the present run at the ordinary speed between Oyama and Yamakita, as some parts of the line are in rather dangerous condition.

The Hongkong Daily Press says that the Madras Municipality is paying six-pice for every rat or bandicoot killed, and three pice per mouse. The returns show 32,733 rats, 8,750 bandicoots, and almost 10,000 mice killed within five weeks. The rodents, which are supposed to convey the plague, are being cremated.

The reported loss by collision of the Shell Line steamer Pectan turns out to be erroneous. The Times of Ceylon says that the vessel lost was the steamer Picton, a steel screw steamer of 2,371 tons (1,527 net) of West Hartlepool, owned by Messrs. R. Ropner & Co. The crew of the Picton were safely landed at Algiers.

The Italian Legation has been informed by cable that Prince Vittorio Emmanuel of Italy, Count of Turin, left San Francisco for Yokohama via Honolulu on the 20th inst. by the Coptic. His Royal Highness is expected to arrive at Yokohama on the 6th of next month. Prince Vittorio, it will be remembered, fought a duel with Prince Henry of Orleans, who had insulted the honour of the Italian army. The Italian Prince got the better of the encounter.

It is stated that the Russian Government intends to create in St. Petersburg, with branches in all the big cities, a Bureau of Eastern Commerce for the purpose of developing trade with China and other countries in the Far East. It is proposed that the Bureau shall be conducted on lines similar to that recently established by the joint action of the French Government and the Chambers of Commerce in Paris, save that its efforts will be directed entirely towards China and that region.

The cost of the public funeral of Mr. Gladstone was £2,[illegible], and a supplementary estimate for the amount has just been issued. The expenses connected with the conveyance of the body to London, and the preparation of Westminster Hall and Abbey, together with the fees payable to the Earl Marshal's staff, constitute, it is explained, the principal items of expenditure. All things considered, these things appear to be managed more cheaply in London than in Tokyo, for a public funeral costs some twenty thousand yen in the former city, and twenty thousand yen represents five times as much to Japan as £2,200 represents to England.

Dr. Lowson, Hongkong's most famous bat, was in a terribly sarcastic humour when interviewed the other day by the China Mail upon the prospects of the Hongkong-Shanghai cricket matches. Said the doughty doctor:—

"Oh, we've no batting, no bowling, no fielding, but we have an umpire—Mr. James McKie—going with us, who will do a great deal to help us. Our scorer, Mr. Hough, will also, no doubt, do his duty."

"Have you selected your team, yet?"

"No; not yet. We have had several political difficulties to get over, but I think we'll have a fair squad when all is settled. Bowling is lamentably weak, but it is no use crying about it. We hope to beat the northerners at golf and tennis, if we get a show. Anton and I will rub the former, while Campbell and Moberly, of the Hongkong Regiment, will give their best a run for their money at tennis."

Mr. Consul Hopkins' report on the trade of Chefoo contains the following interesting incidental note:—Until I came to Chefoo I do not remember having ever read or heard of kerosene being used in agriculture. But in this neighbourhood, and to some extent apparently in other parts of this province, it is thus employed. With such crops as are sown in drills the farmers, at the time of sowing, allow a few drops of kerosene to fall on the seed as it lies in the drill, and they assert that the oil acts as a strong protection against certain insects that are accustomed to feed on the plants at that early stage. But the demand thus created accounts presumably for but a very small part of the whole consumption of kerosene in any given neighbourhood.

The latest cricket gossip from England is interesting. J. T. Brown's score of 300 for Yorkshire has been eclipsed by Hayward, who made 315 (not out) for Surrey against Lancashire. The score of 554 made by Brown and Tunnicliffe for first wicket in the match Yorkshire v. Derbyshire is a record. In July last year the same two batsmen established a record by making in the Yorkshire v. Sussex match 378 for the first wicket, Brown making 311; but a few days later Abel and Brockwell passed this total by one run, making 379 for the first wicket in the Surrey v. Hampshire match. Brown and Tunnicliffe's present score is not only a record for the first wicket, but a record partnership in first-class cricket.

(a) Kt to B 3, preventing the two-step advance of the hostile ♙ P, is preferable. The ensuing variation is a novel one, Black evidently basing his play upon the assumption that the adverse Q P becomes weak, but this is more than offset by the limited scope for his own pieces, which are confined to the first and second rank.

(g) In order to capture the Rook's Pawn on his next move without being subject to check by ♕ to Q 8.

(h) The attempt of winning a second Pawn would be fatal; 32..... Q takes R; 33—Q takes R, Q takes P; 34—Q to Q 8, K to B sq; 35—Q to Q 6 ch, K to Kt sq; 36—Q to K 7, Q to R sq; 37—R to Q sq.

(i) Herewith White embarks upon a very plausible course, which gains a Pawn and would have won the game but for Black's unexpected resource on the 40th move. Q to Kt 3 instead would have won quite easily.

(k) Even had he divined the opponent's deep plot, he could not stem the tide any more, owing to the unfortunate position of his Queen.

(l) Highly ingenious. If 41—R to Kt 7, then K to Q 3, and no matter whether White takes the Bishop or not, the Pawn marches on without hindrance.

(m) A most remarkable game, proving again the necessity for "eternal vigilance" in Chess.

Game No. 432.

During his recent visit to the St. Petersburg Chess Club Lasker defended an Evans gambit against the Russian champion, Tschigorin. The game was a splendidly contested one, abounding in brilliant combinations, and Lasker, who adopted his own line of defense, scored a well-deserved victory. The moves are given below:—

24	P×P	Kt×B	And Black wins
25	Q×Kt	Q B2(h)

Notes by Emil Kemeny.

(a) The usual play is P take P, followed by B to Kt 3. The text move was introduced by Lasker. It seems perfectly satisfactory. White, of course, can regain his pawn by playing P takes P, followed by Q takes Q ch, and Kt takes P, but then his attack is gone, and Black will have better pawns for the ending.

(b) To stop the threatening P to Q R 5, which would win the bishop. The move is much better than the P to Q R 3 play, which comes in next turn with more effect.

(c) Preventing Black from playing P to B 5.

(d) Necessary, for Black threatened Q to ♕ 4.

(e) A powerful move, which puts White on the defense. The position now is very much in Black's favour, who still holds the gambit pawns.

(f) Q takes BP was probably better, though Black, after the exchange of queens, would have captured the QRP, and was likely to win the QP also.

(g) Excellent play, which relieves Black's bishop and gives him a passed pawn on the queen's wing. The combination is a pretty deep one and is perfectly sound.

(h) Of course Black had this play in view when he moved (23) P to B4. Evidently he could not capture the P, for if (25)—B takes P, White would win as follows: (26) R takes B, R takes R; (27) Q takes R, and should Black capture the queen, White answers B takes Q, with a piece ahead. The Q to B2 move is bound to win the QBP, and at the same time attack KBP.

(i) The only chance to make use of the advanced KBP, but it proves disastrous. White probably overlooked the ♕ takes P ch reply. He cannot capture the B on account of Q takes Q which would win at once.

(k) Much better than R takes RP, which would have enabled White to answer with ♕ takes QP. Black then could not capture the R on account of it to B8 ch and mate next move.

(l) Black might have played ♕ takes RP, and if Black answers R(Q sq) takes P then P to R3, but he preferred to maintain the QP and QBP.

(m) To stop the White king from crossing the fourth row.

(n) He had hardly any better play. The exchange of pawns leaves Black with two pawns to the good, winning easily.

(o) It was not necessary for Black to give up the RP, but Lasker had good reason for adopting the text move. By sacrificing the KRP he is enabled to advance the QBP, winning in the shortest possible order.

Game No. 433.

A REMARKABLE CORRESPONDENCE GAME.

The towns of Riga and Orel in Russia have recently by correspondence games of remarkable interests. The score of one of them is given below with notes from the Riga Daily News, doubtless furnished by members of the winning club:—

PETROFF DEFENCE.

	White—Riga.		Black—Orel.
	WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.

16	Kt×B	P×Kt	34 B Q4ch	B B3
17	Kt×Kt	Kt×Kt	35 B Kt2 & White wins (i)
18	B KB3	K B2

NOTES.

(a) ♕ to Q 3 would not be so good.

(b) Q Kt takes P would lose a piece thus 10. B takes Kt, P takes B; 11—Q takes Kt.

(c) Best. If Kt to B 3, White continues B takes Q Kt ch, and after P takes B, Q to Q 3 and Kt to K 5, with a superior position.

(d) A strong continuation would be Q to Kt 3. Black cannot play Kt to K B 3, on account of the reply Q takes Kt P. Black's best move would be Q Kt to Kt 5.

(e) Loss of time. The right move was Q Kt to Kt 5.

(f) If B takes P, White replies B to K B 4, and Black must lose a pieces or be mated.

(g) Black cannot play Kt takes P, on account of the replay R takes Kt, which would involve the loss of a pieces.

(h) After this move White has two winning continuations—R to Q 2, followed by P takes P, and Q to K 2. The latter was chosen for the sake of the pretty ending.

(i) A rather surprising move, but the only one leading to a decisive win. If Q to B 4, Black replies Kt to Q 4, and after the exchange of queens White can win a pawn, but with bishops of different colours Black might get off with a draw. The force of the text move is not obvious at first sight, but on examination it will be found that Black has no defence to the two moves threatened—Q to B 4 and Q to K 7. If 35.....Kt to K sq, White takes the Kt; if K to Kt 2, Q to K 7 ch.

Notes.

Amos Burn, the winner of the Cologne tournament, which has just closed, is a native of Hull, England and is nearly 50 years of age. He has been for many years the champion of the Liverpool chess fraternity, and his tournament career commenced in 1871, in which year he participated in the competition held under the auspices of the British Chess Association, and tied for first and second prizes; in 1886 he tied with Blackburne in the same event, losing in the play-off; he won first prize at Nottingham in 1886; divided first and second prizes in London in 1887; fifth prize at Bradford, 1888; first prize at Amsterdam, Holland, 1889; fifth prize at Berlin, 1897. Mr. Burn resided in Chicago for several years, and is well known to many of the chess players of the Windy City.

In the general tourney of the New York States Chess Association W. J. Ferris of the Franklin Chess Club won, and he holds the cup trophy for the ensuing year.

The Staats Zeitung cup was won by the Manhattan Chess Club, represented by Lipschütz, who defeated Marshal, playing for the Brooklyn Club.

RAW SILK.

The market continues to show an aspect of obstinate dullness. Buyers from America are still apathetic, and prices are in consequence weak and tending downwards. A comparison with last year shows a considerable falling off in the volume of trade. The total settlements so far have been 10,480 piculs, against 14,570 at the same period in 1897. The unsold stock is 10,760 piculs.

MARQUIS ITO had a splendid reception at Peking, being accorded exceptional honours by men of all ranks.

AN old woman named Yada Masu (60), living at Mikasa-cho, Honjo, Tokyo, on the 25th ult., committed suicide by hanging herself in the kitchen. She has been suffering from rheumatism for many years, and this is supposed to be the cause of her self-destruction.

THE Government has decided to grant yen 500,000 for the relief of sufferers by the late storms in Hokkaido.

THE French Cabinet has finally resolved to refer the question of the revision of the Dreyfus Case to the Court of Cassation.

SIR HERBERT KITCHENER has been raised to the peerage and received a grant of £25,000 for his services in the Soudan.

ON Wednesday the Portuguese community of Yokohama duly celebrated the birthday of the King and Queen of Portugal.

MONDAY was the great Jewish fast-day—the Day of Atonement—and was duly observed by the Jewish community in Yokohama.

SIG. MARTINO, late Italian Minister to Tokyo, left Japan this morning by the Marco Polo, en route to Peking, where he has been appointed Minister for Italy.

THE Constitutional Party is shortly to hold a general meeting in Tokyo. It is expected that about 590 representatives from the provinces will be present.

IT is rumoured that the Chinese Emperor will offer the decoration of the Double Dragon to the Japanese Emperor after the arrival of the new Minister in Tokyo.

AFFAIRS are again quiet in the Philippines, Aguinaldo withdrawing his troops from the vicinity of Manila at the request of the American General Commanding.

THE Manchu officials—the conservative element in China—accuse Kang of attempting to poison the Emperor by administering to him two pills when in an exhausted state.

ON the 22nd ult. the BANK OF JAPAN remitted to the Yokohama Specie Bank yen 1,000,000 in gold to be paid as interest to foreigners abroad holding Japanese Government Loan Bonds.

DR. MEACHAM, who has been pastor of the Union Church, Yokohama, for over 10 years left Japan to-day for the States. He was accompanied by Mrs. Meacham, who is in indifferent health.

ON the 25th ult, the Hankai Railway Company held a general meeting at Osaka and decided to wind up the concern. The same day the Osaka Asahi Cotton Spinning Company decided on a similar course.

MR. HAYASHI, Chargé d'Affaires at Peking, reports that the Emperor of China has issued an edict condemning four ringleaders in the Shashi riots to death, and others to imprisonment, while culpable Government officers are fined.

THIS has been a stirring week for China. The Emperor has been deposed—it is feared assassinated—and the Empress-Dowager restored to power as Regent. Kang Wu-yei, the head of the curious reform party, has had to fly for his life, finding refuge on H.B.M. gunboat Esk.

THE Hon George N. Curzon, late Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has been raised to the peerage with the title of Baron Curzon of Kedleston in Ireland.

IT is reported that Marquis Ito and party will stay in Peking until the commencement of October, when they will leave for Shanghai. On the Yangtze river, he will pay several visits. In the beginning of November he will return to Japan.

THEIR Majesties the Emperor and Empress have contributed yen 5,000 to sufferers from floods in Hokkaido, yen 1,500 to Yamanashi and Nagano prefectures, yen 1,200 to Saitama and Ebaraki prefectures, yen 1,000 to Aichi prefecture, yen 800 to Gumma prefecture, and yen 700 to Niigata prefecture.

The income of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for the year ending May last was about yen 10,000,000. The European, American, and Australian lines are estimated to have earned yen 7,000,000; the Chinese, Korean, and Vladivostock lines yen 1,500,000, and the Japanese coasting steamers yen 1,500,000.

ACCORDING to official estimates, 1483, houses were destroyed by the late storm, 11,351 houses flooded, 343 lives lost, 7 persons wounded, 358 domestic animals killed, 9 public roads damaged, 21 bridges broken, 9 river embankments destroyed, and 12,813 cho of agricultural fields injured; 69,185 persons are receiving Government relief.

IN view of the Government's proposal to impose more taxes on medicines, the Tokyo tradesmen interested in that branch of trade have been taking measures in opposition. They have elected a committee of 19, and on the 27th ult. made a written representation to the authorities to the effect that (1) taxation is already too heavy; and (2) that the proposed additional taxes would not raise the revenue expected.

IT is reported that the Government has at last decided to raise a foreign loan of about yen 240,000,000. The authorities have entrusted Mr. Kato, Minister in London, to approach English financiers on the matter. Mr. Kawakami, a Manager of the Bank of Japan, who is now in London, will assist him. The term of redemption would be 30 to 50 years, and it is hoped to secure the loan at 4 per cent. per annum, issuing the stock at yen 95 per yen 100 face value.

THE Import trade prospects are brightening greatly, and the past week has witnessed considerable activity in the yarn market, while grey shirtings and other textiles are also showing signs of revival. A rise of prices in metals at home has rather restricted operations in that direction, but in kerosene there is the usual steady trade. Sugars show a general tendency to rise in price. As regards exports, the demand from Europe for raw silk has rather improved, but American buyers are doing little, and a large stock still remains. Sellers, however, remain firm, and decline to lower prices. The waste silk market is quiet, but prices remain firm. In tea the past week or so has been marked by some increase of business. Yen 20 to 25 yen teas have been chiefly in demand, the cup quality being unusually good for this time of the season. Prices at first hardened somewhat owing to the supplies from the country being cut off, but with the restoration of communi- has supervened.

DEPOSITION OF THE CHINESE EMPEROR.

We publish, in this issue, very serious intelligence from China. Our correspondent, it will be observed, expresses his belief that the Emperor has only been deposed, not murdered. We are not able to take that view. A deposed sovereign would be a very embarrassing factor in any situation in Peking; a dead sovereign would have ceased completely from troubling. Besides, deposition assumes the observance of certain formalities and the connivance of some member of the Imperial family. As to the latter point, the name of the Empress Dowager will probably present itself to our readers. Her Majesty has always been an earnest friend and supporter of Li Hung-chang. It is conceivable that she should sympathise with him in the hour of his downfall and should even listen to his counsels. She has also proved herself thoroughly competent to take the leading part in a coup d'état. If she could connive with Prince Kung in 1861 to effect the overthrow of the Board of Regents and the assumption of governing power by herself, she could also lend ear to-day to a proposal from Li Hung-chang for deposing an Emperor whose sudden access of reforming energy is sweeping away the old landmarks and disturbing time-honoured institutions of the empire. But the difficulty in the way of such a theory is that, according to all accounts, the Empress Dowager was lending cordial support to every progressive step taken by Kwang Hsü. Reasons of State, therefore, can not have induced her to join in any plot for his deposition. Besides, His Majesty's removal from power would certainly be accompanied by the substitution of some other ruler, and the news of the latter event would be proclaimed simultaneously with the news of the former. We fear that the complexion of the intelligence suggests assassination and assassination only.

Kang Yu-wei, who is spoken of as the guilty party, was a third-class Secretary of the Board of Works at the date of our latest detailed advices from Peking. He had been distinguished for some time as an earnest and intelligent advocate of progress, and he was known in the Chinese capital as "Kang the Modern Sage and Reformer." Early in June, a Recorder of the Hanlin Academy, Hsü Chih-chüng by name, memorialized the Throne recommending Kang and Chang Yuan-chi, a third-class Secretary of the Board of Punishments, to the favourable notice of the Emperor as men of profound erudition and progressive ideas. The Emperor, in reply, issued a decree ordering that the two men should be presented to him in the Grand Council Chamber on the 16th of June. The attempt to fix the crime upon Kang, who had just received such an extraordinary honour and whose desire for reform was being gratified to an extent that he could not have hoped in his most sanguine moments, is too clumsy to deceive the world for an instant. An explanation much simpler and more consistent with common sense is to be found in the drastic changes recently inaugurated by His Majesty—the abolition of a number of sinecure Yaméns and posts in the metropolitan and provincial administration; the issue of decree after decree containing sentiments and couched in terms that must have shocked ninety out of every hundred among his subjects, and the wholesale disgrace and dismissal of men from splendid and lucrative positions because they ventured to oppose the dangerous radicalism of a youth of twenty-seven who had hitherto counted for nothing in the councils of the State. It is easy to conceive the feelings of conservative Chinese on reading a decree like the following, issued on the 12th of June last:—

> Some of our aged statesmen who have grown grey in the service of the State and whose fidelity is unquestioned, in their anxiety for the Empire have argued that we ought to stick to the very letter of our ancient institutions and cast away from us the suggestions in favour of a new régime. In fact, all sorts of suggestions have been made by any number of memorialists, most of which are empty and vain and impracticable. Let us ask what other country except our own there is that is labouring under such difficulties, because of being behind the times? What would our condition be if we do not set about at once to drill and arm our armies after modern methods? Will we be able to cut down such expenses? Our scholars now are without solid and practical education; our artisans are without scientific instructors; when compared with other countries we soon see the glaring difference between our strength and the strength of others; and when we compare the ready wealth of this Empire with those of other countries the difference is still greater to our detriment. Does any one think that in our present condition he can really say with any truth that our men are as well drilled and well led as any other foreign army; or that we can stand successfully against any of them? We are conscious of the fact that, unless we in our own person decide firmly and strongly, our commands will not go far in execution, while the greatest dangers lie in the allowing of ignorant persons to meddle and talk and argue amongst themselves upon subjects they know not. It is like applying water to quench fire—all to no purpose.
> The methods of government inaugurated by the Sung and Ming dynasties, upon investigation, reveal nothing that is of any practical use or that may be of advantage to us. In China, for instance, we have had the ethics and doctrines of the sects of Taoism and Buddhism; do they at all agree with the tenets compounded by our five ancient Imperial Sages and three Kings? They are like summer to winter, at opposite extremes to one another. Changes must be made to accord with the necessities of the times. It is apparent that we must give a plain and unvarnished decree on the subject, so that all may understand our wishes. Let this therefore be made known to one and all in the four corners of this Empire, from Prince to Duke, from highest to lowest among the officials of the capital and the provinces, from Court Minister to the most humble of our subjects—let them know that it is our earnest and sincere desire that one and all bend energetically to the duty of striving for higher things, to show all that they are men ambitious to succeed and advance their country; let us, keeping in mind the morals of our sages and wise men, make them the basis on which to build newer and more advantageous methods. We must also select such subjects of Western knowledge as will keep us in touch with the times and diligently study them and practise them in order to place our country abreast with other countries. Let us cast off from us the empty, unpractical, and deceiving things which obstruct our forward progress, and strive with one-heartedness and energy to improve upon all things that we have learned; let us eliminate the crust of neglect that has accumulated on our systems, and cast away the shackles which bind us. In a word, let us evolve useful things out of those which hitherto have been useless, and let us seek able instructors to fashion the materials in our possession. With these objects in view let us strive towards advancement and progress.

If the Sovereign who had the splendid courage to compose and issue such a decree has been done to death by the enemies of progress among his subjects, it will be a calamity not merely for China but for the world. What is to follow? Will it be possible any longer to preserve the moribund Empire from dismemberment? We may be on the eve of events so stupendous that one almost shrinks from contemplating them.

The fundamental explanation of the affair evidently is that the Emperor's zeal for reform outran the capacities and the patience of his principal subjects. There are two parties of progress in China at present, the moderates and the extremists. The former are under the leadership of the great Southern Viceroy, Chang Chi-tung; the latter have for their most prominent figure Kang Yu-wei. It is alleged that a collision between the views of the two was the cause of the political revolution in Peking, and that the moderates gained the day. We do not believe it. We do not believe that any elements of progress survive in the programme of the men who planned and have successfully consummated the revolution. We regard them as conservatives, pure and simple, and we are persuaded that the battle has been, not between radicals and liberals, but between the bigoted adherents of the old order and the enlightened advocates of the new. What particular incident precipitated the collision, it is impossible even to conjecture. Probably no special incident could be indicated. Discontent had been gradually engendered by the sweeping changes that the Emperor had ordered, or was understood to be contemplating, and finally the Manchu Ministers and high officials, whose influence with the Imperial family is enormous, appealed to the Empress-Dowager, and at their instance she consented to resume, in part at any rate, the administrative functions which she had laid aside six years previously when the Emperor came of age. Her Majesty is now in her sixty-fourth year, but she retains a full measure of vigour, and doubtless experiences no little satisfaction at finding herself once more supreme. For she will, of course, be supreme. The theory that she is to be associated with the Emperor for administrative purposes rests simply on the dictates of conventional etiquette. When she first became Regent in 1861, she derived her authority nominally from a decree issued by the Emperor Tung Chih, then a child six years of age. So, again, her authority to resume a share in the government at the present juncture is derived from a decree nominally issued by the Emperor, as the telegraph informs us, on the 23rd instant. But inasmuch as she comes back to power solely because her influence is considered necessary to curb the Emperor's radical tendencies, there can not be much doubt that Kwang Hsü will cease to be an active ruler. With regard to Kang Yu-wei, his arrest was ordered, and soldiers were sent to seize him. They surrounded the house of Chang Yin-yuen—the same Chang who came on the fruitless mission to negotiate peace with Japan in 1895—believing that Kang was concealed there. But, happily for himself, he had effected his flight from Peking on the preceding day. Our telegraphic news shows that he reached Woosung safely by the Chungking; and that he is now on board H.M.S. Esk. It will be remembered that our telegrams of Saturday spoke of the Taotai's having ordered the search of all vessels coming from the north. It is possible that he attempted something of that kind in the case of the Chungking. If so, he soon discovered his mistake. The news that the unfortunate man is safe in the shadow of the British flag fills us with profound satisfaction. The charge against him is grotesque. It can not for an instant be reconciled with the course of events. Do the Manchu Ministers who compassed the deposition of the Emperor because of his zeal for reform expect the world to believe that an attempt to poison him was simultaneously made by the most prominent leader of reform? If the first trouble in Peking was a murderous plot against the Sovereign's life, why did his alleged defenders proceed to dethrone him? The clumsiness of such fabrications would be comical if their results did not threaten to be tragic.

It will be observed that Kang is described by our correspondent as "charged with administering poison to the Emperor." Was poison administered, then, and how did the Emperor fare? On the one hand, we have official accounts representing that the Emperor was a consenting party to the recent changes and that he is to govern conjointly with the Empress-Dowager. On the other, we have the same officials issuing orders and adopting vigorous measures for the arrest of a high officer on the charge of having poisoned the Emperor. It is scarcely necessary to put into words the ominous inferences that such contradictory proceedings suggest.

History repeats itself, especially in China. We can not but recall, at this juncture, the incidents that immediately preceded the death of the last Emperor, Tung Chih. That ill-fated sovereign attaining his 19th year in 1874, the two Dowager Empresses, who had governed as regents since 1861, retired into private life and Tung Chih took into his hands the reins of administration. By his side was a man, Prince Kung, who occupied a place not unlike that recently held by Li Hung-chang: he enjoyed the full confidence of the Dowager Empresses and had acted as their lieutenant. Tung Chih, ambitious to administer as well as to govern his empire, began to make nightly excursions from the palace in order to observe with his own eyes the condition of his subjects. Kung remonstrated, and his remonstrances were met by a decree degrading him and his son. That was the Emperor's last attempt to assert himself. It was also his last opportunity to make such an attempt. The two Dowager Empresses re-appeared upon the stage; Kung was re-instated; the Emperor fell sick, and presently "ascended on a dragon to be a guest on high." He left an Empress enceinte, who, had she given birth to a son, could not have been excluded from the Government which the two Dowagers were conducting so ably. The Empress also fell sick and died. All the preliminary components of the picture now before us in Peking correspond with those of the picture of twenty-four years ago. We can only hope that the last touches will not be added, if they have not already been added, to the tableau. But we can not forget that the choice of Kwang Hsü to be Emperor was the first departure ever made from the direct line of succession in the case of a Manchu Sovereign, and that his titles to the loyalty of his subjects are not of the strongest.

The public has been very confidently informed that the report of the assassination of the Emperor of China is a pure canard. On what ground is the denial based? That is what we all want to know, and that is precisely what we find difficult to discover. The crisis is supposed to have occurred on the 20th ultimo, and it was then announced that the ceremony of formally investing the Empress-Dowager with a share in the administrative power would take place on the 22nd. The Emperor was expected to be present at the ceremony, and on that expectation was chiefly based, so far as we can perceive, the assumption of his safety. This analysis, it must be confessed, is not very re-assuring. If the crime had been committed, one of the methods of concealing it would be to simulate His Majesty's presence at a State ceremony. For how could the public know whether he was present or not? A telegram to the Asahi Shimbun says that the ceremony took place at midnight on the 22nd ultimo within the precincts of the Palace, which was rigorously guarded by troops. Who is to say what really happened within the Palace under such circumstances? To us the only hope seems to rest on the fact that no definite news of the Sovereign's death has reached any of the Legations. A few years ago, there was scarcely any limit to the things that might have happened within the court circle in Peking without the knowledge of the foreign Ministers. But the situation has undergone a great change of late, and we can hardly imagine that if the Emperor had been made away with, the event could be successfully concealed for many days.

But if His Majesty still survives, he is dead for all political purposes. The Jiji Shimpo's correspondent telegraphs from Peking, under date of the 24th instant, that the Emperor is said to be imprisoned in the Palace and strictly guarded by troops. That does not suggest that His Majesty is to have a share in the administrative power, or that he is to be any longer an active element of the situation. In truth he has been wholly superseded, and his reforms have shared his fate. It is surely the acme of credulity to imagine that the light of progress which the Manchu Ministers and their conservative following have extinguished so rudely, will be allowed to resume a flickering existence. It has gone out, and with its disappearance the darkness in which China's independence is to set has been brought palpably nearer.

"The Emperor is seriously ill and physicians of note have been summoned from various parts of the empire." That is the latest from Peking—a telegram despatched on the 26th ultimo at 10.30 a.m. The curtain is being gradually raised, and presently the tragedy will be in full view. In the case of Tung Chih the disease was small-pox and several weeks elapsed before it was allowed to prove fatal. Kwang Hsü's malady is not yet announced, and perhaps in his case also the end may be deferred for a decent interval. It matters little to the unfortunate sovereign, we imagine. That he passed into the Valley of the Shadow at the opening stage of the revolution is becoming more and more certain. If the terrible suspicion should prove to be correct, it will be a nice question for civilized governments to determine what kind of relations they shall hold with the ill-fated Sovereign's assassins. We scarcely like to discuss such a question yet, but it must be confessed that the situation is not improved by the farce which the Manchu Ministers are seriously offering to an audience of intelligent onlookers. If they thought that an Emperor who loved his country better than his dynasty could not be tolerated in China, they might at least have removed him in such a manner that the world might have had some opportunity to believe them innocent. However, we must not jump to precipitate conclusions. So long as a vestige of hope remains, it is our duty to cling to it.

The Imperial Decree reappointing the Empress-Dowager Regent of China was telegraphed to the N.-C. Daily News from Peking under date of September 22nd. It contained no hint of the coming crisis and its momentous events. The document ran as follows:—

At the present moment when our empire is undergoing a most important crisis filled with the heaviest responsibility and difficulties to us, and the internal government of the country for the benefit of the masses demands our closest attention, there may have been matters of high importance which, in spite of our earnestly and diligently labouring day and night at our work, may, amongst the myriads of matters requiring our decision, slip from our notice to the general detriment. This is what now fills us with apprehension. Now H.I.M. the Empress Dowager, Tze Hsi, since the first years of the reign of the late Emperor Tung Chih down to our present reign, has twice ably filled the Regency of the Empire, and never did Her Majesty fail in happily bringing to a successful issue even the most difficult problems of government. In all things we have ever placed the interests of our empire before those of others, and, looking back at Her Majesty's successful handiwork, we are now led to beseech, for a third time, for this assistance from Her Imperial Majesty, so that we may benefit from her wise and kindly advice in all matters of State. Having now obtained her Majesty's gracious consent we truly consider this to be a great boon both to ourselves as well as to the people of our empire. Hence we now command that from henceforth commencing with this morning, the affairs of State shall be transacted in the ordinary Throne Hall and that to-morrow (23rd) we shall at the head of the Princes and Nobles and Ministers of our Court attend in full dress in the Chingcheng Throne Hall to pay ceremonial obeisances to Her Imperial Majesty the Empress Dowager. Let the Board of Rites draw up for our perusal the ceremonies to be observed on the above occasion.

Note.—It will be remembered that all affairs of State have hitherto been transacted in the Grand Council Chamber.

THE LAND OF REFUGE.

It may be assumed that the Chinese reformers who are pursued by the wretched bigots now in power in Peking will make their way to Japan as the nearest haven of refuge. Ever since 1884, Japan has been a sanctuary for Koreans flying from the effects of their progressive zeal, and she will have to extend the same kind of hospitality to Chinese fugitives hereafter. It is probable that her relations with China will be more or less compromised by the fact. The politicians who have proceeded to such extremities in Peking in order to avert changes which Japan has been responsible for introducing into the Orient, will not feel very friendly towards her when they find that she affords sanctuary to the progressive agitators who came to near revolutionizing the fine old Celestial system of corruption, peculation and impotence. It has always been an ambition of the Japanese to become the England of the East. In some respects their desire will be speedily gratified, for, just as England is the refuge of all the Mazzinis and Orsinis and Kossuths of Europe, so Japan will be the sanctuary of the Kangs, and the Changs, and the Bokus and the Kims of her Asiatic neighbours.

ONE OF THE FUGITIVES.

A telegram of unannounced date and provenance is published by the Mainichi Shimbun. It says that, according to a certain person, a certain ship has carried to Hiroshima a certain Chinese subject, supposed to be Kang Yu-wei, whose death the Chinese Government had decreed, but who had been rescued by a certain Power. That is surely vague enough not to involve any responsibility, but it served to fill an "extra" which was doubtless very profitably sold in the capital. Kang, we may be tolerably confident, is safe on board the Esk, and, though Japan is not unlikely to be his ultimate destination, there is not much probability of his coming here immediately. Perhaps some of our readers are not aware that Kang is closely connected with the Ta-tung school—commonly called the Daidō-gakko—in Yokohama. The President of the School, Mr. Tsu Kan, is said to have been a pupil or follower of Kang, and the latter's fellow-thinkers furnished funds to start the institution. The purpose of the School is to provide education of a technical and political character for Chinese subjects without their having to incur the expense of going to Europe or America; for Kang Yu-wei and his friends think that all the necessary educational paraphernalia can be found in Japan. We may note here that the struggle between conservatism and liberalism is said to have been going on for some time in a quiet way between the Chinese connected with the Russian Bank in this settlement and the Chinese that supported or attend the Ta-tung School, the former being friends of the Manchus, and the latter, for the most part, natives of Canton. Kang could be sure of a hearty welcome from one section of his countrymen in Yokohama, if he came here.

There is an error in the statement that Kang Yu-wei was arrested by the Chinese Authorities in Shanghai, and handed over to H.B.M.'s Consul in deference to a protest on the latter's part. What really happened was that H.M.S. Esk went down the Yang-tsze, met the Chung-king at Woosung, and took Kang under the protection of the British flag. That was a much more signal and satisfactory method of procedure than the step reported by our Shanghai correspondent. When Kang set his foot on board the Chung-king at Tientsin (or Taku), he became practically a political refugee in British territory—for, speaking broadly, an English ship is British territory—and the Queen's Government wisely and humanely resolved that the asylum he had sought should prove secure. We say the Queen's Government, but it seems almost certain that Sir Claude Macdonald "made this stroke off his own bat"—to use Lord Palmerston's pet expression. There could hardly have been time for him to obtain instructions from London, unless he had cognizance of Kang's movements from the first, which is scarcely conceivable. One of two things probably happened. Either Kang himself took measures to inform the British Legation direct that he was about to embark in the Chung-king, or Messrs. Butterfield and Swire's agents in Tientsin communicated with Her Majesty's Consul as soon as they knew that Kang was to be a passenger. Either theory involves the assumption that Kang had the wisdom to take the Minister or the agents into his confidence, which argues well for his astuteness. It would be a strong point in favour of his innocence also, but we do not think that any defence of that need be made. Our Shanghai telegram announcing Kang's transfer to the Esk was dated the 24th. Hence the Chung-king must have left Taku on the 21st. Kang seems to have fled from Peking on the 19th. Travelling by rail, he reached Tientsin that night, and having communicated with the agents of the Chung-king, he probably pushed on to Tong-ku by the first train on the 20th, and thence boarded the Chung-king, unless, indeed, she was lying at the bund in Tientsin, which is unlikely, in view of the present state of the Peiho. If Sir Claude Macdonald learned on the 20th that Kang had taken passage in the Chung-king, he must have immediately telegraphed to Shanghai, ordering the commander of the Esk to proceed to Woosung, meet the C. N. steamer and take the fugitive off her; and it is very likely that he telegraphed to Messrs. Butterfield and Swire's Tientsin Agents at the same time, asking them to instruct Captain Dewer of the Chung-king not to pass Woosung until he had transferred Kang safely to the Esk. All that is pretty smart work. It does the highest credit to Sir Claude Macdonald. His action will be heartily applauded by his nationals, for it is in accordance with the dictates not only of justice but also of political expediency. Kang's execution, by some savage process, for a crime in which he had no hand or part, might not have ranked, perhaps, with the horror already perpetrated in Peking, but would at least have aggravated it. There is some consolation in the thought that England's arm has been long enough to avert that additional misery. As to the political import of the step taken by her Majesty's Minister, it is not to be mistaken. England openly proclaims her sympathy with the cause against which the Manchu Ministers and the Empress Dowager have arrayed themselves, and declares that she is ready to protect the patriots, whom they are seeking to do to death under false accusations. The relations between the Governments in London and Peking will be somewhat strained in the face of such doings, but if they were strained to breaking point, the peace of the Orient, the cause of civilization, and the welfare of three hundred millions of human beings might gain materially. Any Power which endorses the act of the Manchu Ministers by clasping hands with them, is welcome to the alliance and to its fruits. England is on the winning side, unless the "eternal law" which decrees victory for right has ceased to be operative.

MR. FUKUZAWA.

The public of Tokyo have received with profound concern the news of Mr. Fukuzawa's sudden illness. There had not been any premonitory symptoms, so far as we can gather, and Mr. Fukuzawa's age—he is only in his sixty-first year—does not furnish any explanation. The attack is grave, and, although no apprehensions are entertained for the distinguished patient's life, it is feared that he will have to abandon the career of intellectual activity by which his country has so greatly benefited.

THE "CHINESE PROGRESS" AND KANG YU-WEI.

A great many people are asking at present, "Who is Kang Yu-wei, and what has he been doing?" As to who he is, a tolerably complete answer can be given. For nearly two years he has been known as an ardent advocate of progress and reform in China, and has been gradually gathering around him a party of fellow thinkers who have made their influence practically felt in many ways—for example, in establishing the Chinese School in Yokohama. Kang came to be known in Peking as "The Modern Sage and Reformer." He held in June last the appointment of Third-class Secretary of the Board of Punishments, and he was at that time recommended to the Throne by a Recorder of the Hanlin Academy as a man of profound erudition and progressive ideas. The Emperor at once gave orders that Kang should be presented to him, and the audience took place on June 16th. Shortly afterwards, the Hanlin Reader suggested to the Sovereign that the establishment of newspapers and magazines throughout the country would prove one of the best means of educating the masses, and the Emperor warmly adopted the suggestion, one result being that Kang Yu-wei was ordered to proceed to Shanghai and assume the editorship of the Chinese Progress. Kang did not immediately comply with the order. He probably thought that his sphere of usefulness would be greatly limited if he were banished to Shanghai, and he seems to have asked for a delay for the purpose of collecting funds to carry on the magazine entrusted to his care. By and by, the Emperor, becoming impatient at Kang's apparent hesitation, issued a decree reprimanding him for tardiness, saying he ought by that time to have collected money enough, and bidding him hasten to take over his new duties. It is said that the Emperor's chief object in this matter was to get Kang away from Peking, where his enemies were becoming so strong and so violent that the Reformer's life seemed to be in imminent danger. Kang, indeed, does not appear to have acted with much tact, for he is supposed to have made foes among the Progressists as well as among the Conservatives. At all events he had the full courage of his opinions, and was unwilling to leave Peking, the centre of reforming influences. The difficulty was solved by the new President of the Board of Rites, Li Tuan-fên, who, about the 10th instant, memorialized the Throne in the sense that Kang's aid was essential to him. Kang accordingly retained the secretaryship to which he had been appointed in the meanwhile at the Board of Works. As bearing very closely on this matter, we reproduce the following extract from the N.-C. Daily News of the 17th September:—

We learn with pleasure, that Mr. Kang Yu-wei is not now alone in his earnest endeavours to effect reforms in this Empire. His followers now are said to consist of more than one half of the Hanlins and Censors and literati in the capital, as well as a whole host of Board secretaries whose views have recently become even more advanced than his, and whose earnestness of purpose has been such as even to defy the opposition of their more conservative superior officers. As an instance, one can scarcely wonder at the surprise and disgust of the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Board of Rites when they read their subordinate, Mr. Wang's, memorial suggesting, amongst other reforms, that the Emperor and the whole country abolish the queue and present Chinese dress for the fashions of the West! Another was to suggest that the country embrace the Christian religion as the State religion, and still another was an advice to his Majesty to take the Empress Dowager on a visit to the Japanese Mikado, in order to see for themselves the pitiful state of China as compared with Japan, which had thrown away the obsolete customs of a by-gone age and adopted everything Western. "An education of the eyes, by such a trip, is worth a hundred thousand suggestions on paper."

Naturally these revolutionary suggestions—according to the lights of these Presidents and Vice-Presidents—quite stunned the readers of the above noted memorial; and we can therefore well understand the anger and chagrin felt when, in spite of exhortations and strong minatory language, Mr. Wang, their subordinate officer, refused point blank either to modify or to withdraw his paper; maintaining his right to demand that his memorial be handed, intact, to the Throne by his superior officers, the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Board to which he belonged. Huai Ta-pu, the Manchu President, deeming first his position as a senior member of the Imperial Clan, and next as an Assistant Grand Secretary, quite safe for him to demand the punishment of the refractory subordinate, persuaded his colleagues to join him in a general denunciation, although Hsü Yung-kuei, the Chinese President, having already been denounced on a former occasion by some Censors for trying to do this same thing—preventing the presentation of memorials—from which he had been warned by the Emperor to desist, tried to get out of signing the report of his colleagues. So also T'êng Kuang-han (Earl Wei-yi), the Chinese Junior Vice-President, who being but newly appointed to his post and a timid man to boot, did not wish to be mixed up with the affair; but Huai Ta-pu, backed by the other two Manchu Vice-Presidents, who are also members of the Imperial Clan, laughed their dissentient Chinese colleagues' fears away, feeling sure of ultimate victory against a paltry third-class secretary.

The result of this episode we all know; and it has made us believe that after all his Majesty Kuang Hsü is so earnest to reform the country by gathering around him a large body of young, enthusiastic, and as earnest workers as himself, that he "sat on" his own kinsmen, men of great power and influence, in favour of a hitherto unknown and insignificant third-class secretary. It is further averred that his Majesty, in issuing his edict handing over the delinquent Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the Board of Rites to the Board of Civil Appointments for the determination of adequate penalties, called the two Presidents of the latter to him and personally enjoined upon them to give an impartial and legal report as to the punishment due to the delinquents for what they had done, warning them that they would receive the same punishments meted out to the Board of Rites' officers if it were found that the Civil Appointments Board had been influenced by a desire to save their fellow Ministers and make their punishment as light as possible.

Thus admonished, the Board of Civil Appointments recommended with commendable alacrity that the delinquent Ministers be "degraded three steps of rank and transferred to posts equivalent to their lowered status." This his Majesty evidently considered too light, in the face of the crisis the country was passing through, and so, as we already know, altered it to a command that "the delinquents be cashiered and dismissed from the service." With the Emperor, the fountain of honour and all official preferment, openly and honestly in their favour, it is not strange that the small party of Reformers, hitherto led by Mr. Secretary Kang Yu-wei, for whose safety on account of his advanced views there were considerable apprehensions, has recently received such an accession to its ranks that even the most powerful Minister of the Crown now fears to oppose the Reform movement, especially as it is now decreed by the Emperor that "all memorials—no matter from whom—are to be henceforth handed to the Throne, intact and unopened, on pain of dire punishment."

THE JAPANESE PRESS ON THE CHINESE AFFAIR.

The utterances of the Tokyo newspapers with reference to the recent event in Peking are not very profound. On the whole the leading journals are plainly disposed to believe that the cause of progress has not suffered permanently, but is only impaired for the moment. The Jiji regards such incidents as inevitable. All radical changes are marked by actions and reactions. Never did a Tokugawa Shogun endeavour to effect reforms without provoking opposition, and the great movement of the Restoration was accomplished simply by the combined efforts of Satsuma and Choshiu. The fact is that the Chinese reformers tried to move too fast. There will be many such collisions in the future, but the young Emperor has only to bide his time. The cause of progress will win in the end.

Such is virtually the opinion of nearly all the leading journals. The Nichi Nichi speaks of the event as a trifling set-back of the tide of progress, and the Asahi goes so far as to say that such obstacles beget a stronger resolution to overcome them, and that the pendulum will presently swing farther than ever in the right direction by and by. Only the Mainichi takes a gloomy view. It thinks that if the intelligence is correct, the ruin of the Chinese empire is not far distant. Russia on the north, Germany on the East, and France on the south, are all waiting to divide the spoils. Nothing could have checked them except the success of the reforming impulse which has now been defeated.

Two or three journals—notably the Hochi and the Asahi—allude to the possibility that the hand of a foreign Power is behind the reaction. If that be so, they say, there is no concealing the gravity of the incident. Its results may be of the most momentous character. That it will restore Li Hung-Chang to power is a generally accepted forecast, and, with the old Viceroy's new lease of political life, Russia's influence is expected to become paramount at Peking. The vernacular newspapers allude to these hypotheses with bated breath, especially in so far as Russia's complicity is concerned. They are plainly anxious to avoid everything of intemperance or precipitancy. The Yomiuri, however, takes occasion to urge once more the supreme importance of an understanding between England, the United States, and Japan. If does not, indeed, regard the situation as in any sense hopeless. Moral forces have been called into active existence, its says, which can not be destroyed or completely suppressed. They will continue operative. The only point is that upon the rapidity and strength of their operation depends China's chance of safety. Those that wish to preserve her integrity must stretch forth a helping hand. Who are they that may be counted in that category? England, the United States, and Japan. There are no others.

MILITARY & NAVAL PROMOTION.

Four well-known officers have been raised by the Emperor to the rank of Taishō, which corresponds to General in the Army and Admiral of the Fleet in the Navy. They are Viscount Katsura, now Minister of State for War, who commanded the left wing of the Manchurian Army in its advance from Takushan to Haicheng; Viscount Sakuma, now Commander-in Chief of the Central District, who commanded the troops sent against Wei-hai-wei; Viscount Kawakami, Chief of the General Staff, and Viscount Ito, who commanded at the Battle of the Yalu and in the subsequent naval operations. The ceremony of promotion took place at the Palace on the 28th instant.

LI HUNG-CHANG.

"Prince Kung and others," we are told by the Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent, "proposed to Li Hung-chang that the Emperor should be deposed altogether, but Li would not agree, and the method of giving regent's powers to the Empress-Dowager was consequently resorted to." If such a proposal was made, it is most improbable that anything would be known about it. No great importance need be attached to that part of the story, though there is no inherent improbability about it. But the incidental reference to Li Hung-chang is very suggestive and interesting. The correspondent seems to have no manner of doubt that Li played a leading part in the revolution, and seems also to conclude that everybody else must be equally convinced of that fact, for he does not think it worth while to accord to it the rank of a separate item of intelligence. If Li has been a prominent figure in bringing about the semi-deposition of the Emperor, who recently dismissed him from office, and the restoration of the Empress-Dowager, who has always been his staunch friend, a very embarrassing situation will exist in Peking for the British Government. Li's removal is understood to have been the direct result of a protest from Her Majesty's Minister that he must decline to transact business with the Tsung-li Yamên so long as Earl Li remained a member of it. Of course Li's return to power need not mean his resumption of functions at the yamên. But it will mean the supremacy of Russian proclivities and the paralysis of British influence, if England consents to be paralysed. She will not consent. Her hands have been tied hitherto by the necessity of complying with certain moral conventions which do not shackle the aggressive energy of Powers having a different system of government from hers. But if circumstances justify her departure from gloved-hand methods, she will not be found backward. That these events have brought the end nearer for China, there can not be much doubt.

THE CLASH OF INTERESTS.

Nothing could be more unsightly than the perpetual friction that is taking place between the sections of the Constitutional party. If they could see themselves for a moment with foreign eyes, they would understand that their conduct is alienating the sympathies and exciting the disgust of all impartial observers. The latest cause of collision is inexpressibly trivial. A committee of four members manages the general affairs of the Constitutional Party, and practically speaks for the Party, delivering mandates and pronouncing decisions in its name. Naturally to be one of these committee-men is counted a great honour. Two of the members belong to the former Liberals; two to the former Progressists. Such a division is in itself highly suggestive. It indicates that the two components of the Constitutional Party did not really coalesce from the outset, but preserved their individuality so jealously as to allow it to become a plain obstacle to efficiency. For when did practical men ever think of appointing a committee of four? Was it not perfectly evident all along that such a committee must again and again find itself paralysed by an equal division of its number when any important question had to be decided? That is just what the Committee seems to have discovered, and a proposal has now been made to add one more to its personnel. We are not sufficiently familiar with the Party's rules of organization to explain exactly how the additional member is to be elected or nominated, but an idea has gone abroad that he is to be a politician, either actually belonging to the Progressists or, at least, affiliated with them. The prospect elicits quite a shrill outburst of indignation from the Liberal organ (Tokyo Shimbun). It describes the incident as of the highest importance; accuses the Progressists of wanting to subject the Liberals to the tyranny of a majority; avers that the balance of power has hitherto been maintained by the equal division of the Committee; declares that if this proposal be carried out, the unity of the Party can not be preserved; reminds its readers that all the Vice-Ministerial Posts have fallen to the Progressists, and concludes that in the presence of such an attempt the Liberals can not remain with folded arms. Could anything be more paltry? A fifth committee man is a practical necessity. He must be either a Progressist or a Liberal. If he is a Progressist, the Liberals will cry out; if he is a Liberal, the Progressists will equally complain. It is an unedifying spectacle and the sooner the two parties sever their impossible union, the better for Japan's political reputation. What particularly disappoints us is that this complaint is made by the Tokyo Shimbun which has hitherto written in a dignified and pacific strain, deprecating all sectional squabbles and deriding the idea that any schism between the two parties was possible. It really looks now as though the Constitutional Party were breaking up into a number of mutually hostile camps and unmanageable coteries.

DEATH OF MR. FUJII.

Mr. S. Fujii, whose death took place on the 26th ult., in the Red Cross Hospital, Tokyo, was only in his fifty-first year. The cause of death was blood-poisoning, due to a malignant carbuncle which refused to yield to the most skilful and careful treatment. Mr. Fujii served for many years in the Foreign Office, and received the appointment of Minister Plenipotentiary en disponibilité some months before his last illness. He was an able and most popular official, and his untimely decease is a heavy loss to the public service. On behalf of his many foreign friends, we offer profound sympathy to his bereaved widow.

A great number of people assembled at Uyeno station early on the morning of the 29th ult., when the remains of the late Mr. Fujii were placed in the train for Mayebashi, where the obsequies are to take place. All classes of society were represented, and it was easy to infer from the nature of the gathering how great and general had been the esteem in which the deceased was held.

The artless Japanese Fairy Tale translated by Mr. Lafcadio Hearne under the title of "The Boy who drew Cats," fully maintains the reputation of the dainty little crêpe books issued by Mr. Hasegawa, the art printer and illustrator of Tokyo.

THE CHINESE REPRESENTATIVE IN TOKYO.

It is stated that the official nominated by the Chinese Government to represent the Middle Kingdom in Tokyo will be unable for a considerable time to proceed to his post, as the illness which at present prevents him from leaving Shanghai is likely to prove of a protracted character. Mr. Li Shin-tok will consequently act as Chargé d'Affaires in the meanwhile. Vernacular newspapers allege that Mr. Li left Shanghai by the American mail steamer on the 24th instant, and add that, immediately after his arrival, Mr. Yano Fumio, Japanese Representative to the Court of China, will return to his post. According to the original intention, Mr. Yano's departure for Peking would have been deferred until November, but the momentous events which recently occurred in the Chinese capital make it desirable that he should resume his functions there as speedily as possible.

RESIGNATION OF THE MINISTER OF JUSICE.

It appears to be tolerably certain that Mr. Ohigashi Gitetsu has resigned the portfolio of Justice, and that the Premier has recommended the Emperor to accept the resignation. The public—the foreign section of it at rate—has considerable difficulty in understanding the reasons of this incident, or in following the course of events that have led up to it. Speaking briefly, the Minister persuaded himself, or was persuaded by others, that the Chief Public Procurator of the Supreme Court, Mr. Yokota, had been guilty of more or less arbitrary and improper procedure in bringing about the retirement of a batch of superannuated or insufficiently qualified Judges, on the eve of the last change of Cabinet. No one alleged that the services of these Judges should not have been dispensed with, or that the interests of the nation were not promoted by their retirement. The only point was whether the share taken by Mr. Yokota in the transaction, coupled with the promotion that accrued to himself, did not impair the character of the result and engender so much umbrage in judicial circles that further and necessary reforms of the same nature would be attended with great difficulties. The Minister, after investigating the circumstances, answered these questions in the affirmative, and concluded that Mr. Yokota' presence at the Supreme Court was not desirable. But Mr. Yokota did not share that view, and there then commenced an interval of effort on the Minister's part and resistance on that of the Chief Public Procurator, until finally the question was submitted to the Cabinet and the decision went against Mr. Ohigashi. There has been a great deal of talk about the affair, but, after all, it was a mere matter of opinion. The Minister took one view of a certain series of incidents; a majority of his colleagues took another, and the usual result has ensued, a resignation. The Ministry is unfortunate in losing one of its number at such an early stage.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEKING REVOLUTION.

There is in official circles in Tokyo a belief, perhaps we should rather call it a hope, that the revolution in Peking will not effectually stop the hands on the dial of Chinese progress: that they will continue moving, though more slowly. We find it difficult to share that confidence. The appeal made by the Manchu Ministers to the Empress Dowager was inspired by their objection to any change that involves interference with their own sinecures. In that respect they represented the sentiments of the whole of Chinese officialdom. The machinery of Government in China may be called an immense complexus of individual interests, all of which are seriously threatened by any movement of reform on Occidental lines. Every administrative section of the Empire exists in the eyes of officialdom solely for the purpose of being exploited. We do not mean to cast any wholesale reflection on the morality of the nation. The Chinese people have furnished ample proofs in other ways that they knew how to be upright, and that they can form organizations admirably calculated to promote integrity. What confronts us in the administrative world of China is a system evolved, not from the moral defects of the people, but from the exigencies of statesmanship; a system deliberately based on the most elementary instinct of human nature, the instinct of gain. From the greatest Viceroy to the humblest Secretary all are concerned in maintaining the system, not for the sake of China, not for the sake of national independence or national integrity, but because its maintenance means the furnishing of an opportunity to Chang, or Huang, or Hu, or Li to amass wealth and win renown. The patrotic instinct is subserved wholly to the personal interest, not because the people are incapable of pursuing the higher ideal—though it may well be doubted whether their capacity has not been grievously weakened by centuries of dormancy,—but because a usurping dynasty descries the best chance of safety for itself in building its foundations on the bed rock of human selfishness. The people at large—for the examination device brings official prizes within everybody's reach—have now enjoyed the sweets of the system for so many years that it has become venerable and necessary in their eyes, and since its radical change must result from any genuine movement of intelligent and patriotic reform, the first symptoms of such reform excite a rebellion which no national disaster could provoke. We have seen the Manchu Ministers and all the body of Chinese officialdom sit placidly with folded hands in the presence of their country's humiliation; humiliation due to the corruption and selfishness of the system which they represent. We now see them provoked to active and efficient protest at the earliest evidences of peril to that system. Can we expect the leaven of reform to work successfully in such a mass? Does it not seem that a cataclysm must hurl this wretched system into the dust before any fair edifice can be built among its ruins? "But," it may be urged, "such arguments might have been advanced at any time: they have no special force at this juncture." That is true, and they have often been advanced in these columns. They derive special cogency, however, from the present crisis, for, unless we are much mistaken, the restoration of the Empress Dowager means a new lease of life for the old methods of administration. Her Majesty has not shown any aversion to reform so long as it was confined to the building of railways, the erection of telegraphs, the introduc- of Western learning, and the re-organization of the army. But the moment that a hand was raised against the governmental machine, she has come forward as its champion, and until that machine is pulled to pieces reform must remain a mere plaything. Apart from these fundamental considerations, the main fact of the situation is that the Emperor has been openly thrust aside because of his progressive instincts, and it is hard to believe that the cause which even the sovereign was unable to maintain will not share his extinction. The Japanese newspapers would fain regard the crisis as a contest between the advocates of gradual reform and the partizans of radical change. They are remarkably sanguine. For our own part, we could never entertain any robust faith in China's regeneration under the Manchu dynasty, and these latest happenings confirm our scepticism.

NEW COPPER COINS.

The new copper coins—1 sen and 5 rin (half a sen), or the sterling equivalents of a farthing and half a farthing—are very pretty pieces. The sen has on its face a cord border within which two sheaves of rice, their stems bound with a knotted ribbon, form a circular medallion having the ideographs is-sen in the centre. On the reverse the centre is occupied by a many-rayed sun—the alternating lengths of the rays producing a graceful effect. Round this sun, and enclosed within borders of dots and cords, a belt contains the ideographs Dai-Nippon Meiji sanjū-ichi-nen (31st year of Meiji) and the words "1 sen." The five rin piece has its reverse entirely occupied by a most artistic design of kiri leaves encircled by a tendril scroll springing from a tiny chrysanthemum. On the face the denomination and date are impressed, the former in ideographs and Roman letters. The sen coin used to bear the inscription hyaku-mai wo motte ichi-yen ni kayeru (100 exchangeable for a yen), but that has now been omitted. Finally, the term for "subsidiary copper coins" is changed from hojō dōka to hojō-seidōka. When these little pieces go into circulation, Japan may congratulate herself on having the prettiest copper coins in the world.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN LOAN.

It is confidently affirmed by vernacular newspapers that the Ministry has decided to float 200 million yen worth of bonds in Europe; namely, 160 millions of Public Undertakings Bonds and 40 millions of Railway Bonds. A British syndicate is said to have offered to take the loan at 4 per cent., paying 90 for the bonds, but the Government expects better terms. There is a question as to whether the whole should be taken at once, or whether the loan should be floated by instalments as required. The latter plan appears most economical at first sight, but possibly the terms obtained by taking the whole loan at once would be so much better as to outweigh the disadvantage of having to pay interest during a longer period.

LIFE ASSURANCE IN JAPAN.

The Annual Report of the Nippon Life Assurance Company for 1897 shows a state of affairs which must be very satisfactory to the shareholders. The subscribed capital is 300,000 yen, and the amount paid up only 120,000 yen. On this there was declared a dividend of 12,000 yen, or 10 per cent., together with a special dividend of 30,000 yen, or 25 per cent. This special dividend is the result of the first eight-year period of the Company's working. Another result was that the policy-holders received a bonus of 33,000 yen. There are now 61,302 policy-holders, and the amount of their policies is 16,826,840 yen—formidable figures when we consider that the paid-up capital is only 120,000 yen. On the other hand, the reserves aggregate 1,317,467 yen, and they were increased by no less than 305,464 yen during the year under review. Going back to the second year (1890) of the Company's existence, we find that it had 5,926 lives on its books, representing 2,001,100 yen, and that its reserves then aggregated 39,103 yen. Roughly speaking, therefore, its liabilities in connection with premiums increased eightfold between 1890 and 1897, and its reserves were multiplied by 33. Evidently the Company's object is to build up a great business on a very small capital, and to effect that end it carries large sums to its reserves every year. The tables show that the additions to the reserve during the eight years of the concern's existence were these :—

1st year	32,497	Yen
2nd year	68,060	"
3rd year	102,914	"
4th year	131,141	"
5th year	180,529	"
6th year	229,326	"
8th year	305,464	"

It is often misleading to compare small things with great, but without drawing any hard-and-fast inference, we may note that the Imperial Insurance Company, of England, having a paid-up capital of £300,000, has amassed reserves and assets amounting to £2,000,000 after 94 years of working, and that the Guardian, after an existence of 76 years, has reserves and assets totalling £4,650,000 against a paid-up capital of £1,000,000. In other words, these two English Companies have accumulated assets equal to 6⅔ and 4½ times their paid-up capital, respectively, after more than three-quarters of a century's operations, whereas the Japanese company has amassed a reserve 33 times as large as its paid-up capital in eight years, and has declared great dividends all the while. It does not appear to us that insurers can be very well treated by the Nippon Seimei-Hoken Kaisha. Nothing is said in this Report about rates, but it appears from the tables that the experience of the past eight years indicates a pretty large margin of safety in the Company's calculations, the ratio of actual to anticipated casualties throughout the period being 0.76 to 1—that is to say, the company fared better than it had expected to the extent of 2.4 per cent. in the matter of risks. An epidemic of cholera, however, might soon sweep away that margin, so that perhaps, on the whole, it is not too large. As for the premia, we observe that 602,403 yen was collected in 1897 on policies aggregating 18,437,470 yen. Hence the average was 3.8 per cent., and inasmuch as 59 per cent. of the lives insured were under 40 years of age, the rate shown by these figures seems large. If the Company can continue its operations during the next twenty years in the same manner as that followed during the past eight, it will find itself in the happy position of having built up an immense business on a very slender foundation. Its expenses, however, are growing with very respectable rapidity. They were 36,925 yen in 1892 and 167,661 yen in 1897.

THE OPENING OF THE DIET.

The Official Gazette publishes an Imperial Rescript summoning the Diet to meet in Tokyo on the 7th of November. It may be presumed that the special session, consequent on the dissolution of the Lower House, and the regular session, will be run into one. Under ordinary circumstances, the regular session does not commence until late in December; a very inconvenient arrangement, one great objection to it being that the Budget never comes up for discussion until after the New Year's recess—that is to say, until the 10th of January at soonest. Hence it does not reach the Peers until a late period in the session, and has to be rushed through the Upper House with unseemly haste. According to the Law of the Houses, fifteen days are allowed for the Budget Committee to prepare its report. Hence, since the House rises for the New Year's recess on the 25th of December, it is evident that the Diet must be convened for the beginning of that month if there is any idea of getting a vote on the Budget in the Lower House before the recess. That has never hitherto been attempted, and probably the Government will experience some difficulty in having the Budget ready by the 10th of November, on which day the Diet will commence legislative business. The difficulty will be overcome, however, and, for the first time in Japan's parliamentary history, we may expect to see the Budget sent to the Upper House before the New Year. The Peers will thus have plenty of time to scrutinize it, and if they prove as critical as rumour predicts, want of leisure, at any rate, need not restrain them.

THE NEW ITALIAN MINISTER TO CHINA.

His Excellency the Chevalier de Martino, who proceeds to Peking to represent Italy at the Chinese Court, will leave Yokohama at an early hour on Saturday morning by the R.I.S. Marco Polo, and will travel direct to Taku, calling only en route at Nagasaki, where the cruiser intends to coal. We observe from the Shanghai papers that the Chevalier was expected to reach his post by the end of this month, but it will scarcely be possible for him to arrive in Peking before the 8th or 9th of October. M. de Martino's presence in the Chinese capital will add considerably to the strength of the party of progress, and his long experince in the East constitutes a special qualification. The crisis in the fortunes of the Chinese empire certainly demands the services of able men at the foreign Legations in Peking.

THE OPINION OF THE CHINESE LEGATION.

A few days ago, the public was edified by a reported interview with a member of the Chinese Legation. It betrayed an almost comical state of unconcern and perfunctoriness on the part of the Middle Kingdom's officials in Tokyo. The Mainichi Shimbun now publishes another interview, which is decidedly interesting. The Chinese official—an anonymous personage, of course—emphatically dismisses the idea that the Emperor is dead. That he says, is a pure canard, but he makes no attempt to set forth the grounds of his confidence. There is no doubt, of course, about the restoration of the Empress Dowager to power, and possibly the event may have given rise to more or less disturbance. But the root of the whole trouble is a collision between the southern—or Cantonese—faction and the Manchu party in the capital. The Kiaochou incident and the Port Arthur affair thoroughly aroused the bulk of the people from their apathetic mood, and convinced them that the only chance of preserving the empire's integrity and independence is to inaugurate reforms on Occidental lines. The leaders of the southern section are notably resolute on that point, and they have so precipitately and unreservedly given effect to their radical views that a collision with the comparatively conservative Manchus became inevitable. Kang Yu-Wei never succeeded in ingratiating himself with the Empress Dowager. Her Majesty's return to power would, therefore, be certainly followed by his loss of influence and dismissal from office. But he had the ear of the Emperor and it is probable that His Majesty warned him, perhaps even assisted him, to fly from Peking.

We may mention here that no official telegram suggesting the Emperor's death has been received up to the present in Tokyo. Indeed, so far as can be ascertained, His Majesty is alive. On the other hand, while the official telegrams have hitherto made no allusion to his illness, two messages from Peking to the North-China Daily News were very explicit. The first, dated at noon on the 23rd ultimo, described His Majesty as so seriously ill that fears were entertained for his life; the second said that the Foreign Representatives had called at the Tsung-li Yamên to inquire about his condition. As for Chang Yin-huan, telegrams of uncertain provenance have been received in Tokyo saying that he had been condemned to death, but would probably be respited in deference to the representations of a certain Minister.

ASHIO COPPER MINE.

Tokyo is threatened with something like an invasion. An immense body of farmers—estimated by the police at 7,000 and by other authorities at from eleven to fifty thousand—set out, on the 27th instant, from the districts which recently suffered so much injury owing to the destruction of the poison-prevention works at the Ashio Copper Mine. Doubtless our readers remember how, session after session, the irrepressible Mr. Tanaka Shozo used to address Questions to the Government and accompany them with long and vehement impeachments of the owner of the mine, of the officials who allowed him to carry on his money-making operations without due precautions to prevent the discharge of the poisonous products into the Watarase River, and the consequent wasting of large tracts of arable land along the course of the stream. The Government finally took up the question vigorously, and the owner of the mine erected, at a very heavy outlay, large works for disinfecting or destroying the injurious products. These works were destroyed by the recent floods, and the Watarase, swollen to an unusual height, carried the poisonous matter and spread it over a wide area in the prefectures of Gumma, Tochigi, Saitama, and Ibaraki. The tenants and owners of the devastated lands seem to have concluded that only a monster demonstration can obtain for them the relief they desire, namely, remission of taxes, and a great body assembled, by previous arrangement, on the 27th ultimo, and set out for Tokyo by various routes, intending to come together at Dokan-yama near Oji. The police authorities at Kawamata, on the Tonegawa, attempted to stop the party passing along that route, by breaking the bridge over the river, but the farmers made their way down the bank to a ferry, and, finding that the ferry boats also had been removed, obtained possession of some junks, and got across in parties of 700 to 800 at a time. It is stated that the provisioning of the whole body was undertaken gratuitously by Mr. Kimura, a silk-merchant of Ashikaga, and that a certain Mr. Noguchi is in chief command. The police have made arrangements to stay the main body at Senju and Itabashi, but presumably the leaders will be allowed to proceed to Tokyo and state their case at the Departments of Home Affairs and Agriculture and Commerce.

The police have shown so much vigour and vigilance that of all the big crowds which set out from the north to enlist official sympathy with their hard plight, only about a hundred people have managed, thus far, to make their way to Tokyo. They are quiet folks enough, too heavily weighted with care and too sharply tormented with hunger to be boisterous or aggressive. Sleeping on the roadside or in the fields, and feeding on anything they could find, many of them seem to have thought that their duty would be discharged if they reached Tokyo and laid themselves down in the shadow of the Noshomusho. Their prayer is to have their lands restored to a productive condition; the Watarase River dredged and embanked; a fresh survey made of the devastated districts; their taxes remitted, and the owner of the mine, Mr. Furukawa, compelled to pay compensation for the injuries his work has caused.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo succeeded in inducing one party of the petitioners to retrace their steps. He went to met them at Soka, beyond Senju, and harangued them into confidence. It was a characteristic speech. Had the former Government been in power, their demonstration might be right enough, he said, but there was no fear that the present Ministry would treat them with indifference. He himself would undertake to procure justice for them, and, if he failed, he promised to forfeit his life. Mr. Tanaka is nothing if not vehement. He never descends below superlatives when he speaks in public. Some of the Tokyo journals are disposed to hold him responsible for this commotion, and it may reasonably be contended that the strangely intemperate harangues delivered by him from time to time in the House of Representatives must have produced a very exaggerated impression of their wrongs among the people on whose behalf they were uttered.

A THIEF TO CATCH A THIEF.

The remarkable success achieved by the Japanese police in recovering articles stolen from the person has always been understood to be the result, first, of the very stringest control exercised by the Authorities over the business of pawnbrokers and dealers in second-hand goods, and, secondly, of the assistance which the detectives derive from the thieves themselves. It often happens that a watch stolen from somebody's pocket at a railway wicket or in the street is returned intact to its owner within twenty-four hours. Now there is no conceivable system of ordinary detection by which that result could be attained. Once the watch has passed into the hands of a pick-pocket, and he has got clear away with it, he can defy the police if he pleases, and there is nothing, nor can there be anything, to prevent him from extracting the jewels and melting down the gold or silver at his leisure. If the article is to be recovered, the police must have some back-stairs route for getting at it. That is precisely what they have. Pickpockets in Japan seldom carry on their operations on individual account. They work in gangs, and each gang has its head-man, the whole business being systematised and organized in a most thorough manner. The police are well acquainted with the head-men, and have long been in the habit of utilizing their services for the detection of serious crimes. That involves, of course, some reciprocal consideration on the part of the police, and the only possible consideration is that the pick-pockets enjoy a measure of latitude within certain limits. Doku wo motte doku wo seisu (to control poison with poison) is an old Japanese proverb, and we believe that the police have acted on it ever since Tokugawa days. But the present Chief of the Metropolitan Police is altogether opposed to such methods. He has issued an instruction to the effect that no intercourse of any kind must exist hereafter between the police and the pickpockets. We suspect, therefore, that there will be no more instances of signal recovery of property stolen from the person. The police will no longer be able to make application to a head-man of pickpockets for the restoration of this or that article. The head-men, on their side, will find their position somewhat irksome, since they are known to the police, and can be pounced upon at any moment when a theft occurs within their district.

The following Indian telegram possesses more humour than is usually allowed to filter into these prosaic productions:—The Bombay Legislative Council concluded its sitting and the discussion of the Budget estimates on Saturday evening. The year opens with a balance of nil, and with the necessity of putting by 20 lakhs for future balance. As Mr. Nugent, who prepared the statement remarked, financially the Bombay Presidency is on its beam ends.

THE FORMOSAN RAILWAY.

The projectors of the Formosan Railway are said to be divided into two sections, one favouring the immediate dissolution of the Company; the other seeking to postpone that result as long as possible. The former section is headed by Messrs. Shibusawa, Okura, and Imamura; the latter, by Messrs. Ono, Matsuki, and Manaka. After five postponements of the date fixed by the charter for the commencement of building operations, it certainly does seem that the Company should step out of the arena. The project was taken up originally at the suggestion of Marquis Ito, after his visit to the island, and was warmly promoted by the Government, a guarantee of 6 per cent. being given as well as important facilities and valuable concessions. But the people of Japan have no money just now which they can afford to invest on such terms. There is nothing for it but to transfer the undertaking to official hands. Baron Kodama, the Governor-General, is said to have foreseen that issue for some time, and to have caused plans and estimates to be prepared. The chief of the civil section, Mr. Goto, is to bring the documents to Tokyo soon, and on their receipt a bill will be drafted seeking Parliamentary consent to convert the enterprise into a State project. The capital required is 30 million yen, and it will probably be obtained by the sale of bonds. The Nippon, never averse to putting a bad construction on events, alleges that the reluctance of Messrs. Ono, Matsuki, and their followers to abandon the undertaking is due to the difficulty they foresee in winding up the accounts satisfactorily. The three thousand shareholders have already paid up 385,000 yen, and three hundred of them have furnished an additional sum of 15,000 for expenses of promotion. All that money, says the Nippon, has not remained intact, and the day of settling is anticipated with some trepidation. We find it hard to credit our contemporary's insinuation.

THE WEALTH OF JAPAN.

There never yet has been published any detailed estimate of the wealth of Japan, highly interesting as such an investigation must be. Two or three times we have attempted to make approximations in these columns, but we could never claim to have made any exhaustive research. The last number of the Tōhō contains the first minute table hitherto compiled. It is signed "Onjōji Kyōshi," and the method adopted is that of the English political economist Mulhall. We translate the statement in full:—

I.—PRIVATE LANDS.

	Area, in acres.	Value, in yen.

With regard to this table, we may observe that the valuations seem altogether too low. Rice lands are put down at 321 yen an acre, or 80 yen a tan, whereas the average market price is probably 250 yen a tan; dry fields are valued at 89 yen an acre, or 22 yen a tan, which is curiously cheap; building land stands at 298 yen an acre, a figure smaller than that for rice-growing land; and forests are reckoned at only 2.60 yen per acre. Surely it is a flagrant error to suppose that the building land throughout the empire averages only 25 sen per tsubo, and the forest land only seven shillings an acre! Proceeding with the tables:—

The above figures are based on statistics for 1894 and 1895. In our opinion, the value of lands should be nearly doubled, and that of buildings increased by fifty per cent. It is worth noting that Giffen's estimate of the wealth of the United Kingdom in 1875 was 8,548 millions of pounds sterling, or over ten times the figure for Japan. On the whole, a yen in Japan is approximately the representative of a sovereign in England.

MARQUIS ITO IN CHINA.

From Mr. Ooka Ikuzo, the well-known member of the Diet, who accompanies Marquis Ito on his Chinese trip, there have come to the Chuo Shimbun some interesting notes. It appears that the Marquis, after having been received at Taku and escorted to Tientsin by a party of officials, was invited to dine with the Viceroy of Chihli on the 12th ultimo. An equipage—the familiar sedan chair—came from the Viceroy's Yamén to carry the Marquis, under a strong escort of soldiers. The dinner was in the Hall of Medicine, presumably at the College, and is described as a very brilliant affair. Marquis Ito was met by the Viceroy at the gate, and, as he stepped out of his vehicle, the troops, of whom a large force was drawn up, presented arms. All the prominent personages in Tientsin were present at the dinner, including Mr. Yuan Shi-kai, the celebrated Chinese Resident in Sōul before the war, and General Nieh Tsz-ching, of Pyong-yang fame. The sight of these gentlemen suggested some embarrassment to the Japanese guests. But the Chinese soon showed that they had completely laid aside all umbrage in connexion with that time. In fact, their eyes have been opened to much larger issues, for Kiao-chou and Port Arthur have shown them the absolute necessity of preparing to avert the calamities that threaten the Empire's integrity. They recognise, therefore, that in the course pursued by Japan lies the only chance of safety, and instead of counting this country an enemy, they entertain towards it strong feelings of friendship, and are desirous of profiting by its example. Nothing could exceed the eagerness shown by every one, from the Viceroy downwards, to obtain suggestions from Marquis Ito, and His Excellency Yang related that memorials had reached him urging the advisability of inducing the Marquis to lend his valuable aid to China in the position of Adviser of the Government.

The following day, the 13th Sept., the Marquis was entertained by the Governor of Tientsin, and on the 14th he started for Peking, leaving at 11 a.m. by special train, and reaching the capital at 3 p.m. There again a most enthusiastic welcome awaited him, the same eagerness for reform being exhibited on all sides, and the same earnest inquiries addressed to him. Calling at the Tsung-li Yamén on the 15th, he met Prince Ching and three other Ministers, but, although closely questioned by them about his ideas on the subject of China's policy, he practised unwonted reticence. On his way back, he called at Li Hung-chang's residence, and Mr. Ooka gives a graphic account of the unfeigned delight shown by the old Viceroy on meeting him. Li stood outside the vestibule, supported by two attendants, and on seeing Ito, he clasped both his hands, and, looking fixedly and affectionately at him said:—

Li—Ah, I see the grey hairs have come.

Ito—Yes; I have grown terribly old.

Li—Don't say so. You seem young and hearty.

Ito—Well, after all I am 14 or 15 years younger than you. I am a child compared with you, am I not.

The Viceroy then led his visitor in, and after they had pledged each other in a glass of champagne, the conversation turned upon many subjects, Korea, China, in the latter, foreign politics, and other matters, all of which were discussed in the frankest manner. But of course the details are not given by Mr. Ooka. He quotes the following fragment only :—

Li—Our Emperor is very earnest in all administrative matters, and spares no effort to promote the country's interests. He gladly takes counsel with all who can be useful. People here talk about asking you to become our Prime Minister and entrusting to you the work of carrying out large national reforms. But I do not suppose that you would agree or that your Sovereign could spare you.

Ito—Such a position would be beyond my capacities. I should have no choice but to decline. But I can assure you that the ability displayed by your Emperor, and the wisdom he displays in seeking counsel excite the greatest admiration, and are a source of rejoicing to foreigners.' But experience has established the rule that clever monarchs must have clever Ministers to assist them, or they can not accomplish anything great. Who are His Majesty's advisers?

Li—Prince Bismark made a similar remark to me when I met him on the occasion of my last visit to Europe.

Ito—Yes, indeed. Bismarck was himself a conspicuous example. The Emperor William had such implicit confidence in him that the voice of even the Empress herself would not have been listened to in opposition to his.

Li—Nothing less can succeed. When that state of affairs exists, then and only then is it possible to work genuine reforms. But I am not prepared to say who are the advisers of our Emperor or whether His Majesty has any competent persons at his side.

At this point the conversation ceased to lend itself to publication. Mr. Ooka adds that the talk about getting Marquis Ito to become the Emperor's adviser does not appear to have been mere jest. It was renewed when the Chinese Ministers came to return Marquis Ito's visit. They said that if he could be induced to accept the task for a period of even three years, it would be of immense benefit not merely to China but to the East in general. They also begged that, when received in audience by the Emperor, Marquis Ito would speak without the least restraint upon all topics raised by his Majesty.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

The Japanese must be a good deal gratified to find that China is really beginning to sit at their feet for instruction in the alphabet of progress. To obtain that kind of recognition from their big neighbour has long been an object of ambition to the people of this country. They knew that for many a day China despised them; regarded them as renegade upstarts; apostates from the creed of the Orient. Four years ago, they had the satisfaction of proving to her in the most signal way, that whatever moral comfort she might derive from her conservatism, its material result had been impotence. It really was a very keen satisfaction, we imagine, and on the whole the Japanese can not be said to have been unduly inflated by it. But what the best of them hoped was to see China make practical and voluntary acknowledgement of her error, as she is now doing. We do not wish to be interpreted as predicting the renovation, the resurrection, the rejuvenation of China. There has been nothing of that kind in the case of any State since the history of the world began to be written, and the one solitary exception to the universal rule is not going to be furnished by a nation whose whole time and energy are absorbed in the grim struggle for every-day existence. But, whatever the fruit of China's new mood may be, the mood is there, in semblance at all events, and Japan would be more than human if she did not hug herself a little and chuckle softly over the news that two hundred Chinese youths are coming in the train of the new Minister to learn "how it is done." People say that when the Chinese Government made application to Japan with regard to this project, there was considerable delay in obtaining a reply, and that the Emperor Kwangsu betrayed some impatience. They say, also, that when the answer did come, it was found to be at once practical and cordial, for Japan promised not only to welcome the students, but also to pay the expenses of their education. We hope she did not do that, for it would have lacked the grace of true courtesy; but it will become her well if she can persuade her own students and young folks in general to treat the new-comers with civility, and to spare them any display of the bumptiousness and self-assertion now unfortunately forced on the attention of the Ke-tojin and the Ijin-papa in this country.

SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

In No. 75 of the Short Essays Dr. Katō is contributing to the Taiyō, he strongly recommends Japanese scholars to take some steps to make their writing better known in Europe and America. The University memoirs have a very limited circulation. The publication of a journal in a foreign language in Japan is at present attended with enormous difficulties. Hence Dr. Katō recommends his fellow-countrymen to make an effort to gain access to the learned magazines of Europe and the United States. The one obstacle to this is the inability to write an article in a foreign tongue that shall be entitled to rank with the literary contributions of Europeans. But this difficulty can be overcome by submitting manuscripts to the careful revision of foreigners versed in the languages in which they are written. Judging by the reception which the memoirs of the Imperial University have met with by learned societies in Europe, it is very much to be regretted, says Dr. Katō, that the names of so few Japanese are found among contributors to the pages of foreign periodicals.

In Essay 78, Dr. Katō discusses Party Cabinets, and argues that people who advocate such Cabinets here are not aware of the many evils attending them. There is nothing more oppressive and more despotic than the rule of victorious parties in certain countries. Japan is not ready for Party Cabinets, and has taken no steps to guard against the abuses to which this form of government is exposed.

In the next essay Dr. Katō dwells on the paucity of those who think independently on any subject. What is called public opinion is only the opinion of a few leaders of thought whose utterances are reiterated by the unthinking masses.

The Kyōiku Jiron has a good deal to say on the need of establishing closer relationship between Japan and China. The Chinese are at the present moment investigating Japanese educational methods, and it is to Japan's interest to respond to the conciliatory action of the Celestials in every way possible. The two countries have much in common. It should be Japan's ambition as the Eastern pioneer of Western civilisation to lead the Chinese into the paths of progress. In order to obtain full and reliable information on Chinese affairs, the editor of the Kyōiku Jiron, Mr. Tsuji Takeo, has been despatched to China, and his letters will shortly appear in the pages of the Magazine. Mr. Otori Keisuke contributes to the Kyōiku Jiron an article advocating the study of Chinese in Japan to a greater extent than has hitherto been the fashion. We show a remarkable want of enterprise in this particular case, says Mr. Otori. Here is a huge country, thickly populated and with endless resources, at our very doors, whose ideographs and written forms of speech are familiar to us, and yet how few of us make any attempt to master Chinese colloquially. The number of Europeans who can make themselves understood in China is very large. One reason of the backwardness of the Japanese in learning how to speak Chinese is the practice of reading the words of Chinese sentences out of their proper order. In ancient times Sorai stood forth as a strong advocate of discontinuing the habit of altering the order of the different parts of a sentence in reading Chinese. Dr. Shigeno is in favour of modern Japanese commencing to study Chinese by reading the words and interpreting them as they stand in the way that Occidentals do. The pronunciation known to the Japanese is what is called the 漢音 Kan-on, or the 呉音 Go-on. In ancient times the former was common in the north of China, the latter in the south. Both methods of pronunciation have in the lapse of ages so changed in China as not to be recognisable to the Japanese at the present time. For all the purposes of officials, says Mr. Otori, a knowledge of Mandarin is sufficient, but merchants should study one or more of the many dialects in use among traders, either the Foochow, the Shanghai, or the Amoy colloquial.

In the Tōkyō Asahi Shimbun a writer signing himself 天外生 Tengwaisei draws attention to the comparative popularity of the various professions, as shown by the list of yearly graduates at the Imperial University. The following table gives the percentage of students for each subject, extending over the past five years :—

farmers are worthy of attention. Literature holds its own from year to year, being much more popular than science, whose votaries are astonishingly few. The increased interest taken in English Law during the last few years is a fact worth noting.

The Russian Language School located in Sapporo has, we observe, included Chinese as well as Russian in its curriculum. This school was founded in 1895 by Mr. Nakano Jirō. It was considerably enlarged two years later, accommodation for boarders being furnished and a spacious school—house erected. There are 74 students attending at the present time. The school staff consists of a Japanese director, a manager, and a superintendent of the teaching department, 1 Russian professor, 1 Chinese professor, 1 Japanese professor of Russian, and 3 Japanese professors of Chinese, and a number of subordinate officers.

In the Tōkei Shūshi appears an address of Count Okuma's on Finance and the development of the present Finance Department. We give the gist of the Count's remarks:—The term 會計 Kaikei is now exclusively applied to money accounts and their management, but thirty years ago it was used in a much broader sense, and included business that is now undertaken by the Home Department, the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, the Department of Communications, and even the Department of Justice. At that time nobody in Japan knew anything of the elements of finance as it is known to-day. The art of arranging statistics was also unknown. When, in the second year of Meiji, I began to pay attention to the subject, my first efforts to obtain from the daimyō reliable figures as to products, population, taxes, &c., were failures. The Government of that time was almost solely dependent on land taxes for its revenue. Even in the great cities there were no such things as municipal taxes. There were what were called 冥加金 myōgakin, or thank-offerings, which, being voluntary, were very uncertain. The taxes were paid in rice, and the quantity received depended on the crop. In no two years was the revenue at the disposal of the government alike. The money realised was divided into 12 parts, and thus the expenses of administration were met month by month. But in the year in which intercalary months occurred the Government was often in great straits, no adequate provision having been made for the extra month. With the change in the calendar came the régulation that all taxes were to be paid in money. It was a long time before we decided on the best method of arranging statistics. We consulted several Americans on the subject, and at last began to see our way. An office called the 統計寮, Tōkeiryō, was established in the third year of Meiji; but its methods were not such as would meet with approval now. When Mr. Kido went to Europe as ambassador he succeeded in obtaining the services of Mr. Mayet, to whose labours the Department of Finance was immensely indebted in later years. It may be said that Mr. Mayet's arrival and advice marked the commencement of the modern era of finance in Japan.

Mr. Fukuchi Genichirō, whose nom de plume is Ochi Koji, contributes to No. 272 of the Kokumin-no-tomo an article entitled Kokutai, Shakai Shugi, the National Constitution and Society. With those who think that there is anything irreconcilable between the principle of nationalism and society, Mr. Fukuchi does not agree. As regards the Japanese Constitution, though nominally the Emperor has always had supreme power, in all times this power has been limited, and the actual administration has been in the hands of ministers. These wielders of the real power of government, briefly enumerated, were the houses of Fujiwara, Taira, Minamoto, Ashikaga, Toyotomi, Tokugawa, and the Satsuma and Chōshū Clans. Now they have been succeeded by the Constitutionalists. None of the forms of government that have been devised can be said to be exactly suited to the constitution of Japanese society. There are those who think that Parliamentary government like that of England will suit Japan, but such is not my opinion, says Mr. Fukuchi.

Coming to the structure of Japanese society, Mr. Fukuchi argues that though there is not such a wide difference between the rich and the poor as exists in many other countries, the poor have invariably been oppressed by the rich. In the future, legislation must pay more attention to the improvement of society generally, and the development of government must proceed side by side with the amelioration of the condition of the large population of the empire.

It is stated in the Gwaikō-jihō, of which Dr. Ariga is the Editor, that Doctors Tomii and Motono have translated 3 section, containing 734 articles, of the Japanese Civil Code into French, and that the work was issued in Paris last March. They have appended to the translation a history of Japanese Law. This work, combined with Dr. Lönholm's valuable English translation, says the Gwaikō-jihō, will help to prepare the way for the easy operation of the new Treaties.

To the Osaka Mainichi Mr. Hara Kei, the editor, a few months ago contributed a long series of articles, extending over seven or eight weeks, on Japan's relations with foreigners and preparation for mixed residence. Last May these articles were issued in book form, and sold so rapidly that the third edition of the work appeared on July 19th. The articles are written in a popular style, and the views advanced are of a liberal type. The introduction of foreign capital is recommended, and it is urged that permission be given to foreigners to hold land in their own names.

Increased attention is being given to Japan's relations with foreign countries and to the rapid extension of Western Powers in Eastern lands. Mr. Nakagawa Seijirō has published a work entitled 西力東漸史 Seiryoku Tōzenshi, "A History of the advance of Western power in the East," which covers 570 pages and is pronounced by the Kokumin-no-tomo to be the best work on the subject that has appeared. The title is somewhat misleading, as Mr. Nakagawa by no means confines himself to the doings of Occidentals. He discusses Japan's foreign relations very thoroughly, giving an historical account of her connection with Western countries and sketching the rôle that she ought to endeavour to play in the near future. In the opinion of the Kokumin-no-tomo Mr. Nakagawa's work differs from such volumes as the Hirado Boyeki-shi, the Kodai Shōgyō-shi and the 內政外教衝突史, Naisei Gaikyō-Shōtotsu-shi (The Friction between Home Government and Foreign Religions). These histories are confined to special aspects of Japan's foreign intercourse, while Mr. Nakagawa's work traverses the whole subject in a most thorough manner. The Seiryoku Tōzenshi sells at 70 sen per copy at the Shunyōdō, Tōkyō.

Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō, in an interview with one of the staff of the Taiyō, is represented as giving utterance to the following opinion on Oriental ethical teaching:—Although some very fine religions have sprung out of Eastern soil, as regards Buddhism and Confucianism, it may be said that they are defective in not laying stress on the importance of public-spiritedness. This is a characteristic of Brahminism as well. Throughout the whole of India there is no such thing as public spirit. The reason of the omission of this virtue from the ethical systems of the East is apparent. By Buddhism the world is regarded as defiled and defiling; hence its doctrine is that each individual should endeavour to separate himself from it as much as possible. But the Japanese as a people have more public spirit than is taught by the religions they have espoused. Sacrifices for the State and the public good are very common. In the moral education of the future great attention should be paid to the cultivation of a public spirit. It is most essential that the influence of the strong individualism taught by the creeds should be counteracted.

Count Soejima has published a work called Seihin Kyōiku, the "Education of the Mind," which sells at 60 sen per copy at the Seishikwan, Tsukiji, Tōkyō. The Count some little time ago delivered a course of lectures on Japanese national characteristics and the best method of developing the inherent powers of the race. These lectures were taken down as delivered and are now given to the public in book form.

The Rikugō Zasshi has a good deal to say on this volume. It points out that the educational agencies enumerated by Count Soejima do not include Christianity and Western Science, both of which have played no mean rôle in moulding the minds of leading men in modern times. Count Soejima has not even traced the effects of Buddhism and Confucianism on the native mind. The foundation of his system is certainly lacking in stability. He assumes the existence of the gods and the immortality of the soul, and treats man as the lord of creation. As a protest against the materialism of the age this is to be commended, says the Rikugō, but it is to be regretted that Count Soejima did not select a more scientific basis for his theory of mental development. The Rikugō Zasshi, however, writes favourably of some parts of the work. Specially does it commend the manner in which blind sectarian bigotry is condemned and shown to be contrary to the traditional instincts of the best class of Japanese. In order to illustrate what is the general sentiment on this subject the Count relates the following story. In ancient times there was in Hizen a brave knight called Nabeshima Heigorō, who belonged to the Nichiren Sect. On being informed by a priest, one day, that all who did not belong to the Nichiren sect would go to hell, Nabeshima at once said that he wished to leave the sect and enter the Zenshū. On being asked the reason he replied that since his lord and master belonged to the latter sect, he, his master, would go to hell and confront the great Emma in the land of shades. He, Nabeshima, could not think of allowing his master to stand alone at that critical moment. Together had he and his master lived, and in death they should not be divided.

The Shakai Zasshi publishes a long article signed "Mushikian," entitled Shinhōten to Nihon Kokumin, "The new Codes and the Japanese People." The tone of the article is one of regret that so much outrage has been done to Japanese customs and rules of life in the new Codes. The first part of the article is historical. The various collections of laws in ancient times are noticed in order. From the dawn of history down to the end of the Tokugawa era Japanese laws were kept free from foreign elements.* But the revised laws (Kaitei Ritsurei) published early in the Meiji era were to a considerable extent founded on foreign Codes. "Mushikian" maintains that under foreign law crime has increased in Japan and morality degenerated. The reason assigned for this is that the old laws of Japan being based on the traditional instincts and inherited sentiments of the people, compliance with them was comparatively easy, but the newly imported laws in many cases are quite strange, if not distasteful, to the minds of the people. There is all the difference in the world between a nation which practices virtue from custom, law or no law, and whose laws embody deeply seated notions of right and wrong, and a nation that has grown to think that written laws are the only laws that need be observed and that any amount of vice may be committed so long as it does not bring the perpetrator within the clutches of the written law. This is the difference that separates the present generation of Japanese from their pre-Meiji forefathers. In modern times it is most common for parents and children and brothers to go to law against each other—conduct almost unknown in former times. It is a thing of everyday occurrence to find two men disputing and unable to agree, because one quotes the law and the other moral usage. One will say, "According to our Japanese custom it is wrong to do such and such a thing." To which the other replies, "A fig for your customs; the Law allows me to do it, and I mean to exercise my rights." This is one of the most serious of the consequences of our adopting laws that are not based on national customs.

Another particular in which modern Japanese differ from their predecessors on which "Mushikian" dwells is in the amount of general knowledge of the laws under which modern Japanese live. In ancient times it was never intended that any but the administrators of the laws should comprehend them. Take that noted collection called the Teiyei-shikimoku (A.D. 1232) promulgated in Hojō Yasutoki's time. It was written in stiff Chinese, which no peasant could understand. The same may be said of the 南朝法制 Nanchō-hōsei (The Law of the Southern Court;† and of the Kemmu Shikimoku (A.D. 1336). In the Tokugawa days 4 bodies of laws were in constant use known as (1) the 公武法制 Kōbu-hōsei, "The Law for Court Nobles and Military retainers;" (2) The 公家法度 Kugehatto, "The Law for Court Nobles;" (3) The Buke Sho (諸) hō "The Law for Military Retainers;" and (4) The 僧家法度 Sōke hatto, "Law for Priests." But not even the persons whom they most concerned knew anything of their contents. But at the present time there is a very widespread interest in the provisions of the new code, and in hundreds of instances before taking action merchants and others are careful to inquire into the laws which affect the transaction they contemplate. It is the progress of education that has made this possible. But the evil connected with this state of affairs is a readiness on the part of people to rush into lawsuits to an extent hitherto unknown.

The Shakai Zasshi has some comments on newspaper and magazine writing which are worth transcribing:—The devotion of space to short comments on current events has become a feature of provincial as well as metropolitan papers. In Tōkyō the Nichi Nichi has its Kinji Hempen, the Asahi its Kōjinroku,‡ the Yomiuri its Hagakishū, the Mainichi its Dajare Hagaki, the Jiji its Ippitsu Mōshiagesōrō, the Nippon its Bonkotsubō no Chōmen, and the Yorozu Chōhō its Suntetsu. For Chinese verses on current events the Nichi Nichi, the Mainichi, and the Yorozu Chōhō are the most noted.

Coming to magazines, the Nippon jin for many years has kept on its even way, and has discussed the political questions of the day with a freshness and thoroughness that is quite exceptional.

The Keisai Zasshi for the past 12 years has not degenerated in any way. Its utterances are those of mature and well-informed minds.

Among new magazines the Gaikō Jihō, occupies a high position. Its articles are usually signed and show great research. On the subject of foreign intercourse there is nothing to compare with this periodical.

The new Kokumin-no-Tomo, a monthly magazine resting on the ashes of the Far East and the Katei Zasshi, though increased in size, lacks spirit.

The Waseda Bungaku retains its modesty of tone and mildness of spirit, and is very carefully edited and most reliable.

The writers for the Taiyō are principally men belonging to the staff of the magazine. The illustrations of this periodical attract more attention than its articles, but among the large amount of material that it collects there is much that is worth reading.

Though the Tōkyō Dokuritsu Zasshi is only 20 pages in length and is regarded by some as a mere channel for the outlet of the wrath of Mr. Uchimura Kanzō, it is a necessity of the age in which we live.

The new political party has started a magazine called the Kensei-tō Tōhō (憲報). It is in all respects exactly like the old Shimpō-tō Tōhō. But this latter paper paper was always miles ahead of the Jiyū-tō Tōhō.

Since Tōkyō has become the headquarters of the Hansei Zasshi this magazine has grown very prosperous. Supported as it is by the Otani brothers, it can afford to pay good writers.

The Ten-chi-jin, as its title indicates, covers a very wide area. Mr. Takahashi Gorō, its editor, is extremely active. The publication is full of valuable matter. Nevertheless it is not appreciated as it ought to be. The mass of readers are by no means good judges of the real merits of the journals offered for sale.

Among Buddhist magazines the Bukkyō and the 十善寶窟 Jūsen-hōkutsu are the only ones worthy of special mention.

The Rikugō Zasshi discusses serious subjects only. It is more literary than political. Its articles on economy are written with ease and are free from bias, but we regret to say fail to attract much attention.

The Kyūbakufu has more material at its disposal than it knows what to do with. Its sale is large. Its editor, Mr. Togawa, is perhaps better versed in Bakufu affairs than any one living. Then come Messrs. Katsu, Tanabe, Fukuchi, and Kimura. When these men die, who will be left to write the history of the Bakufu?

The Shinseiki is an organ of the Protestant orthodox party, and, under the editorship of Mr. Kosaki, has a good deal to say to young men. No very striking opinions are expressed on current events. Its tone is unassuming. It can only be regarded as the young man's friend.

In the Nihon Shugi, omitting comments on passing events, the articles most deserving attention are from the pen of Dr. Motora, entitled "A talk on Middle Class Education and Ethics."

The Kokkai Zasshi has become much more serious than it used to be. The Tetsugaku Zasshi has of late been publishing articles by new writers. A year and a half ago its items of news were well worth perusal, but it only takes half an eye to see that of late the magazine has greatly fallen off. The Dainihon Kangoku Kyōkai Zasshi and the Kangoku Zasshi both discuss prison reform and kindred subjects; the latter seems to be the best supplied with material suitable for publication.

* The fact of large importations from China is overlooked here.—(Writer of the Summary.)

† The reference is to the divided empire consequent on the rebellion of Ashikaga. The Southern Emperor was the rightful sovereign.

‡ Kōjin—red dust, literally. The term is applied to scraps of news, to the 101 trifles of life.

THE AMERICANS AT MANILA.

AGUINALDO GIVES WAY.

The United States gunboat Petrel, which arrived at Hongkong from Manila on Sept. 19th, reports that Aguinaldo has complied with the ultimatum of General Otis and that collision with the Americans and the insurgents has thus been avoided. One of the insurgent chiefs, however, stationed at Pasay, declined to remove his troops at the time that Aguinaldo removed his, and Aguinaldo, knowing what would be the outcome of his officer's stubbornness, asked General Otis for three or four days' grace so that he might commune with the man and endeavour to get him to listen to reason. Apparently there is some prospect of the differences between the Americans and the natives being satisfactorily arranged, for a correspondent at Manila writes:—"The natives are very friendly towards the Americans, and simply delighted with the prospect of becoming Americanos. Vessels which a few weeks ago flew the insurgent flag are now adorned with the Stars and Stripes." Apparently, however, the American soldiers in Manila are heartily sick of the place, and would be only too glad to hear that they had been ordered to return home.—Daily Press.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

Now that a general idea has been obtained of the Budget for 1899 1900, the theory that the Government's programme of military expansion is disproportionate to the nation's resources seems to be gaining strength. The Mainichi Shimbun has never ceased to insist on the necessity of reducing the dimensions of the programme, but hitherto it has been a voice crying in the wilderness, for no one seemed to endorse, or even attend to, its views. But the Yomiuri has now embraced the same cause, and the Yomiuri's adherence is significant, for whereas the Mainichi represents the doctrines only of the section led by Mr. Shimada Saburo, the Yomiuri is supposed to be in touch with the Constitutional Party in general. We are bound to say, however, that the attitude of the Yomiuri has greatly perplexed us of late. It is controlled by Mr. Takata Sanaye, who holds high office in the Department of Education. Yet it writes almost as though it were an Opposition journal, and goes even to the length of directly attacking Count Okuma's foreign policy. Perhaps, therefore, its adoption of the armament reduction doctrine does not mean so much as might be supposed at first sight. Concerning the arguments advanced by these journals, there is little to be said. They take the line that the limit of the economies which can be effected by administrative reform is one or two million yen, whereas by cutting into the Army's appropriations a reduction of several millions can be at once effected. In short, the root of the present financial difficulty is in excessive military expansion, and no amount of paring and pruning in other directions can place the finances on a solid basis. There is no doubt that the policy of withdrawing the Army and Navy from the general purview of the Cabinet tends to strengthen the hands of the anti-expansionists by creating a feeling of umbrage and discontent. That sentiment seems, indeed, to be the real inspiration of the Yomiuri's writing, for it calls upon the various sections of the Constitutional Party to lay aside their petty squabbles and join forces for a united assault upon the Army and Navy. "If the two services are to remain as they are now, it would be better to dissolve the Constitutional Party at once and abandon all idea of responsible cabinets." That is the very extreme position taken by our contemporary. Its chief object, of course, is to substitute party politicians for the present holders of the military and naval portfolios, but its writing seems also to be permeated by a strong undercurrent of dissent from the magnitude of the Army appropriations.

It is the conclusion of the Mainichi Shimbun that the spirit which animates aspirants for official posts in Japan is entirely wrong. They regard office much as a merchant regards his business, namely, as a source of income and a means of livelihood; whereas their true object ought to be the service of the State. No man should consider himself qualified for a high administrative position until he has acquired a fortune sufficient to render him entirely independent of the emoluments of office. That is the rule practically observed in England. Harcourt was making fifteen thousand pounds sterling at the bar when he entered political life, and he was rich enough to give up his legal practice and become a public servant. Chamberlain also was a man of wealth before he accepted office, and Cobden had ample means from the first. Such a state of affairs is ideal. Perhaps it is too soon to expect anything of the kind in Japan. In the meanwhile, however, let there be an end of all the foolish talk about balancing power and dividing prizes between parties, and let men be chosen for office with regard solely to their fitness. The place-hunting fever had its origin in the appointment of persons entirely without claims to such distinction. Seeing that not fitness but favour was the basis of choice, men who otherwise would never have entertained any serious aspirations, began to think that they too should have a chance, and so the mania grew.

Some very serious complaints are urged in the columns of the Jiji Shimpo against the new Civil Code. An anonymous writer, who calls himself a barrister, alleges that, in the first place, the Code having been somewhat hastily framed to meet the requirements of foreign policy, is, in many respects, opposed to the customs of the country, and these, therefore, furnish no guide to its interpretation. On the other hand, the text lacks explicitness, and often lends itself to two or three renderings, in which respect it compares unfavourably with M. Boissonade's draft, the latter being very minute and drafted with wonderful prescience of contingencies. The only hope for the satisfactory administration of the new Code is that authoritative precedents should be established as quickly as possible. But unfortunately authoritative precedents do not accumulate in Japan. The seven Courts of Appeal have final jurisdiction in many classes of cases, and they give their decisions quite independently of each other, so that suitors do not know which of the various judgments rendered should be deemed conclusive. It is simply a question of chance. The lower tribunals, also, show a strong disposition to interpret the Code without much reference to decisions rendered by the Supreme Court or the Appeal Courts. The public are consequently quite perplexed, and law-suits are multiplying at an alarming rate. Such are the views of the writer in the Jiji. They would be disquieting were they not obviously premature. The new Civil Code has not yet been three months in operation, and it is plainly quite impossible that its operation can have furnished experiences sufficient to warrant such criticism. We shall not be wrong, probably, if we judge the critic to be one of those who, having been connected with the drafting of the first Code, are prejudiced against the Code that supplants it.

The Specie Bank is the object of an uncompromising attack in the Mainichi Shimbun. No less than four long articles are devoted to the assault. Their gist can be easily stated. In the first place and before everything, the Bank is charged with utter subservience to officialdom. Its largest shareholders are the Bank of Japan and the Imperial Household, and every recommendation having an official cachet is accepted by the management without query. No matter how unqualified a person may be, if he is put forward by the Finance Department or the Bank of Japan, he is sure of an appointment in the Specie Bank. Out of the Bank's available funds, ten millions are lent to it by the Nippon Ginko at 2 per cent., and it takes very good care not to offend such a benefactor. On the other hand, its treatment of the public is almost scandalous. For remitting money within the limits of Japan, it charges 30 sen per 1,000 yen, whereas other Banks perform the same service for 3 sen for the first thousand yen and 1 sen for every additional thousand. Similar extortion marks its action with regard to foreign bills. It buys at the selling price and sells at the buying, charging a small commission, indeed, but putting its hand into people's pockets in both ways. The consequence is that every Japanese merchant acquainted with the English language avoids the Specie Bank and repairs to the Hongkong and Shanghai. It behaves most unfairly to Japanese emigrants in Hawaii and America. They have necessarily to remit money through the Bank, but until the sums deposited reach a certain figure, they are not sent over, and meanwhile the Bank does not allow any interest on them. Finally it buys the gold in America and Hawaii at rates most severe to the sellers, and, in short, exploits them all round. There is a great deal more about the Bank's arbitrary method of treating forenoon and afternoon balances; about the lazy, perfunctory habits of its employés, and about its general indifference to the convenience of the public, the final conclusion being that the institution is a kind of "asnate for superannuted protegés of the Finance Department" (Okuratho no rokiu-sha no genroin). This is not the first crusade made by the Mainichi against the Specie Bank.

The meeting of prison officials at the Department of Home Affairs has attracted some attention. Journalistic opinion is plainly in favour of Count Itagaki's proposed reforms, but there is a feeling that to carry them out at once in their entirety would involve an outlay which the Treasury can not easily face. The system called kojin-teki gushu-ho, or individual treatment, will certainly be forthwith adopted, but the system of separate cells (bumbo sei) will have to be carried out more gradually. The Nippon says that the draft bill submitted by Count Itagaki to the meeting about the treatment of foreign prisoners provoked considerable discussion. It was finally approved, however. It provides that foreigners shall receive special consideration to whatever extent is necessary for the preservation of their health (kenko wo iji seshimuru no teido ni oite sōtō no shinshaku), but that they may be gradually familiarized with Japanese methods of living. The latter reservation will doubtless be viewed askance by many persons.

The Jiji Shimpo takes a highly unfavourable view of the trouble between the Minister of Justice and the Chief Public Procurator. It says that the question would have been settled long ago had not the Prime Minister been anxious to avoid the embarrassment of having another portfolio to dispose of. It says, also, that the Liberals have greatly complicated matters. Intensely chagrined at their failure to obtain either the principal or the second place in the Foreign Office, they have set their hearts upon getting the portfolio of Justice for one of their people, and have accordingly persuaded the Ministers of War and of the Navy to join them in voting against Mr. Ohigashi, whom they hope to drive out of office. Appended to this severe judgment there is an explanation of the comparatively small strength of the Progressists for purposes of resistance, since their two principal sections—the old Kaishin-to and the Kakushin-to—have never really coalesced, and since the Shimada section has now raised a turbulent head. But we spare our readers any recapitulation of these weary analyses.

Turning to the question of foreign politics, the most remarkable article we find is a vehement crusade in the Nippon against Germany. It call Germany the enemy of peace, basing the charge on her behaviour towards America at the Philippines and on her seizure of Kiao-chou. Her proceedings at Manila admit of no defence, in the Nippon's opinion, and the United States, whose conduct has the sympathy and applause of the civilized world, has rightly demanded an explanation. As for her seizure of Kiao-chou, it inflicted a serious injury, not on China alone, but also on Japan and, in truth, on all nations. Germany is swayed by a spirit of aggressive aggrandisement and her methods of pursuing her aim are startlingly arbitrary. She is inflated with success and spurred by pride. Why do not the nations of the Occident combine to restrain her? If they really desired peace, they would recognise the necessity of controlling its principal enemy. There was no occasion to wait for the Czar's invitation to concert measures of tranquillity. We need scarcely remind our readers that the Nippon is the Nippon. Its columns are capital reading, full of vehemence and superlatively outspoken, but we should never go to them for an exposition of sober public opinion.

The Jiji has a really delightful article about the birth of a progressive spirit in China. For centuries the world's teacher, the leader of the van of civilization, China, in her old age, is obliged to become a pupil. Who can fail to sympathise with her necessity or to applaud her courage. She is coming to Japan for help, Japan who has played the part of taster and is now able to declare that the viands are not poisonous. Japan must treat her with all courtesy and deference. Japan is but one step ahead of her neighbour: a short forty years comprises the whole of her reforms. The victory that she gained over China in war was a fortunate mistake (kega no kômyô), and that she should be applauded for it by foreign nations only makes her feel ashamed. She owes China an immense debt of gratitude. She has received innumerable and invaluable benefits at the hands of her neighbour, and an opportunity now offers for repaying a small fraction of them. What, then, should be China's method of procedure? It appears to be very generally supposed that she should have a new Government, and that officialdom should take the lead in all the reform movements, just as officialdom did in Japan, carrying the nation forward with breathless rapidity. Surely that is a great mistake? If the two nations did not differ radically in anything else, their enormous disparity of size would alone suffice to forbid their adoption of the same method. China is to Japan as an elephant to a dog. The huge animal must adapt its movements to its bulk. Japan has made one great mistake in a cognate matter. She tried to apply her own fashion of quick reform to Korea's case, and she failed signally. When the students which China intends to send arrive in Japan, they ought to be confined, as far as possible, to technical and scientific courses, and should not be allowed to fill their heads with political theories, which only breed a fever in the blood and, by imparting to them the character of revolutionists, would incapacitate them for playing a really useful part on their return home. Japan must spare no pains to help her neighbour. China has been teacher in the past, and it is now the pupil's turn to aid the teacher. We need scarcely say that this article was published before the receipt of the news about the administrative revolution in Peking.

YOKOHAMA CHORAL SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of the Yokohama Choral Society was held on Tuesday evening at the Van Schaick Hall, Mr. J. T. Griffin presiding.

The CHAIRMAN briefly recalled the proceedings of the last meeting, the minutes being unavailable; and the HON. SECRETARY (the Rev. E. S. Booth) made a brief statement to the effect that as far as the last season was concerned there were three attempts at practices, but they were without success; and finally the attempt was abandoned for want of people to take part.

Mr. H. SHARP said when he took over the Hon. Treasurership from Mr. Walford there was a balance of yen 91.48, which had since been reduced by the payment of yen 10.50 for insurance.

The CHAIRMAN then said a few words with reference to the programme for the coming season. He said some members of the musical community had asked him whether it would be possible to obtain the services as conductor of the Society of Mr. Junker, a prominent musician who was on a lengthened tour for the sake of his health, and who proposed to spend the winter in Yokohama. It was suggested that with this gentleman as conductor they could give comic opera and other pieces under his direction. He (Mr. Griffin) replied to these gentlemen that as president of the Society he could not pledge it, and he recommended them to attend that meeting and put forth their views on the matter. Since then he had received further information and had found it was the wish of a certain number of the musical community to engage under Mr. Junker whether the Society took the matter up or not. Mr. Junker of course wanted a monthly salary, and he had been guaranteed that for six months by a syndicate that had been formed. In return Mr. Junker would give some three or four concerts. He (Mr. Griffin) for his own part thought it would not be well for the Society to pledge itself to anything of the kind, and he would recommend that they should agree to stand aside for the present season to give Mr. Junker a free course; let him and his friends do all they could. It would of course be quite in order for any members to join the choir, and he thought it would be the best plan for them to do so. They would not be incurring any risk or binding themselves as a society. He would willingly join himself, but that was impossible, as Mr. Junker only wanted ladies.

Mr. FRASER, the SECRETARY and the TREASURER expressed approval of the plan, the Secretary adding that it was certain that the Society was not in a position to give any financial help.

The CHAIRMAN embodying his views in a resolution, it was seconded by Mr. SHARP and carried, and the meeting ended.

THE ANGLO GERMAN UNDERSTANDING.

There is much talk in the American papers reaching Japan by the Canadian Mail concerning the reported Anglo-German alliance. It does not, however, bear exactly the look of authenticity, and evidently those pests of serious newspaper readers—the descriptive reporter and the interviewer—have been inventing much more than they actually ascertained. For instance, the New York Tribune publishes a statement to the effect that "Joseph Chamberlain" (it appears to be de rigueur in an American paper to refer to a public man in that rudely democratic fashion) had "frankly said to a Tribune reporter that the treaty with Germany had been signed." Mr. Chamberlain also "made it clear that the English Government favours the retention of the Philippines by the United States." When asked as to the opinion he held regarding the most advantageous course which the United States could pursue respecting the Philippines, he replied "diplomatically," "However much I would like to talk upon this matter, I must not do so, for the simple reason that anything I might say in that direction might seem like giving advice or suggestion to the United States by a foreign statesman—and that, besides being invidious, would be imperti nent." And then he commenced, according to this interviewer, a rambling, inconsequential conversation on things in general, the West Indies, the views of European Powers as to a possible British-American alliance, and so forth. This of course must be pure invention. We cannot admire Mr. Chamberlain's "new diplomacy" as instanced in his famous Birmingham speech, but it is incredible to think that even Mr. Chamberlain amuses himself by chatting to a penny-a-liner representing a New York paper on matters of State importance.

Discounting these very positively expressed but transparently untruthful stories, however, there appears to be something in the talk over an understanding between the two Powers. A London telegram of a more sober description says that Germany and England are supposed to have come to an understanding on all African questions. In February, 1895, Germany made a formal claim upon Lord Kimberley, the British Foreign Secretary, for the maintenance of the status quo in South Africa, the special object being to protect the Transvaal from British control. Germany would, it is said, now withdraw absolutely from the claim and leave Great Britain a completely free hand in South Africa. Steps necessary for England's acquisition, by amicable arrangements with Portugal, of part of Mozambique would also receive the assent of Germany, who would, too, recognize the permanence of the British occupation of Egypt, when, next year, England will asks Europe for a curtailment of the jurisdiction of the mixed tribunals. As a quid pro quo, Germany asks for a settlement of the frontier in Togoland. The neutral zone, called Dagombiland, between Ashantiland and Togoland, would be divided, giving Germany the bulk of the zone. Further, assent would be given to the arrangement which the German Emperor expected to make with the Sultan during his visit to the Holy Land, to facilitate the German colonization of Asia Minor. A statement is also made that England and Germany have agreed upon the joint creation of a railway through the German sphere of Shang-tung, China, to the British sphere of the Yang-tze Valley, but this cannot be confirmed. So far we have seen no quotation on the subject from any journal of real authority.

MR. ROBERTON'S PICTURES.

There are probably many in Yokohama and Tokyo who admire good landscape painting, and not a few to whom an opportunity of enriching their own collections of pictures will be welcome. These would do well to pay a visit to Keil's Building, where Mr. A. J. Roberton is giving an exhibition of water and oil colours. Mr. Roberton is an artist to the finger tips, and his work is marked by a touch of distinction that many industrious landscape painters painfully lack. It is not mere photography in colours, and the smallest of the sketches has an individuality of its own. In his studies of Japan, both of scenes in the vicinity of Yokohama, and the more impressive neighbourhood of Nikko, he has seized with admirable results the essential features of Japanese scenery; the shimmering tremulous blue of sky and sea are reproduced admirably in the sketches of Negishi and Mississipi bay, while the dark masses of mountain and foliage characteristic of the hill resort are caught by a no less happy inspiration. Nature in her sterner aspects is seen in the landscapes of the Himalayas and in several fine pictures of the English Lake District, but perhaps the gems of the collection are studies of the delightful scenery of Surrey and Kent. Those who know those two charming counties will be glad to have the memory of them and their distinctively English scenery—the smiling meadows and verdant hedgerows dotted with majestic forest trees, the lazy rivers and the rustic homesteads—revived in so pleasant a manner. It reminds one that there are other objects in the world than paddy fields, bamboos, Japanese houses, and hideous godowns.

AN INTERVIEW.

A representative of the Fiji Shimpo proceeded to the Chinese Legation last Saturday, and this is the conversation that passed, he says, between him and one of the Legation Officials, who, for the rest, seemed wholly unconcerned, and were amusing themselves according to their wont:—

Q.—Did you receive any telegram yesterday with reference to the events in Peking?
A.—No.
Q.—Have you sent any telegram to make inquiry,
A.—No.
Q.—Why have you not sent a telegram?
A.—Because we didn't know whether the news was true.
Q.—But if you didn't know, was there not all the more reason for inquiring?
A.—They should have telegraphed to us.
Q.—But are you not uneasy?
A.—No.
Q.—Why are you not uneasy?
A.—Because we don't know.
Q.—That is very fortunate. Good-bye.
A.—Good-bye.

A PORTUGUESE HOLIDAY.

The birthday of the King and Queen of Portugal by a happy coincidence falls on the same day, the 28th September. Wednesday was therefore a fête day among the Portuguese community in Yokohama. At the Portuguese Club the national flag, lanterns painted with national colours, and the arms of Portugal were displayed, and in the evening the exterior of the Club was brightly illuminated. The interior was very nicely decorated, the picture of Dom Carlos I. being conspicuously exhibited.

The popular Consul-General, Snr. Freitas, gave a reception in the evening, and the health of Their Majesties was enthusiastically drunk.

YOKOHAMA HARBOUR REGULATIONS.

The following regulations have been issued by the Yokohama Harbour Office. They are to come into operation simultaneously with the Open Port Regulations:—

Art. I.—The limits of the Yokohama Harbour shall be subdivided into four sections, namely, anchorages for warships, steamers, sailing vessels, and miscellaneous ships and boats.

Article II.—The space within the breakwater shall be divided as follows:—

INSIDE BREAKWATER.

No. 1 Section shall be that which lies to the northward and westward of a line drawn from a mark post on the Breakwater in a N.E.½ N. direction to the New Hatoba.

No. 2 Section shall be that which is comprised within a line drawn southward and eastward of the above-mentioned straight line.

OUTSIDE BREAKWATER.

No. 3 Section shall be that lying south of a line drawn E. from the White Lighthouse to the boundary line of Harbour limits.

No. 4. Section shall be that lying north of a line drawn E. from the Red Lighthouse to the boundary line of Harbour limits.

Art. III.—Nos. 1 and 2 sections specified in the preceding article shall be used for the anchorage of steamers, small sailing ships, and miscellaneous craft.

No. 3 Section shall be used as anchorage for warships.

No. 4 Section shall be used as anchorage for vessels laden with explosive or inflammable cargoes and sailing vessels of and above 300 tons.

Art. IV.—Though generally restricted to No 3 section the Harbour Master may, according to circumstances, permit warships to anchor within the breakwaters. Torpedo catchers and torpedo-boats may take moorings within the breakwaters at places specified by the Harbour Master.

Art. V.—In case of ships and boats lying in the Harbour limits seeking shelter through danger from heavy weather, they may, without waiting for the permission of the Harbour Office, take up moorings at suitable spots.

Art. VI.—The fairway for vessels entering inside the breakwater shall consist of the space between two parallel lines running east and west from the lighthouses situated at the extremity of each breakwater. This fairway shall extend to 5 cables from the lighthouses outside the breakwaters and 2½ cables inside.

Art. VII.—In case of rough weather the Harbour Master will indicate buoys or anchorages for incoming ships by means of special signals from the Light-ship.

Art. VIII.—When an incoming ship has reached the anchorage pointed out by the Harbour Master she shall moor with two anchors.

Art. IX.—A ship that has arrived after sunset shall lie at anchor till sunrise outside the breakwaters clear of the fairway. It is, however, provided that regular mail steamers possessing buoys or anchorage previously assigned them may, when permitted by weather or other circumstance, at once proceed inside.

Art. X.—With the exception of warships no ship shall use swinging booms while lying at anchor. This restriction does not apply to vessels anchoring outside of the breakwaters.

Art. XI.—Steamers entering or leaving harbour must not proceed at more than half speed. After passing the entrance of the breakwaters or moving inside the breakwaters, the speed must be limited to that sufficient to maintain steerage way. Sailing ships must only use enough sail to give them way or must employ tug-boats.

Art. XII.—Under no circumstance shall ships cross the course of other ships or overtake them while in the fairway or within the breakwaters.

Art. XIII.—Under no circumstances shall vessels obstruct the passage and moorings of others.

Art. XIV.—When a steamer employs the service of tug-boats within the breakwater the following restrictions must be adhered to, except in cases specially permitted by the Harbour Office:—

1. The distance from the stern of a tug to that of the lighters or boats towed shall not exceed 350 feet.

2. Lighters, etc., may be towed in pairs, but the length of the tow shall not exceed 350 feet.

3 More than one sea-going vessel may not be towed at a time.

Art. XV.—Under no circumstances shall a ship or boat approach within 600 ft. of the Customs Pier at the Western Hatoba except those ships or boats which are going alongside the Pier.

Art. XVI.—Warps for shifting purposes shall not be kept fast to mooring buoys or piers any longer than is actually necessary.

Art. XVII.—Storm-warning signals will be hoisted on a signal staff within the premises of the Harbour Office.

Art. XVIII.—In heavy weather, if it be necessary to drop a second anchor, a vessel must veer one shackle of chain on the buoy before doing so.

Art. XIX.—The provisions enacted in the Law for the Prevention of Collision at Sea, besides those specified in the present Regulations, shall apply to all matters relating to the anchorage or passage of vessels within the Harbour.

THE LATE SIR GEORGE GREY.

Sir George Grey, whose death at Kawau Island, Auckland, New Zealand, Reuter has just announced, was a man who in his time played many parts. A son of Lieut.-Col. Grey, who fell at the storming of Badajos, one of the most famous of Wellington's Peninsular exploits, the future P.C. Consul came of illustrious stock. He first entered the Army, joining the 83rd Foot, but at the age of 29 received the important appointment of Lieut.-Governor of South Australia. This was in 1841. Those were stormy times and Grey faced every question bravely. Within five years he found himself in New Zealand as Governor, and he reigned there till 1854 with considerable success. Then he moved on to the Cape as Governor and Commander-in-Chief and made a name for himself as a friend of the native races. His record was stormy, and he was not sorry when he received his reappointment to New Zealand—1861-67. The Maori wars had left a legacy of thorny questions behind, but Sir George was just the man to deal with them. Sympathetic to a degree with all the aspirations of the subject race, he yet held the balance of justice at a level which none dare question—and so peace fell on the land. In 1872 he retired after thirty years hard service for the Crown. He returned to England but the environments were not to his liking and New Zealand became his home for the rest of his life. Fate plays strange pranks with her favourites, of whom Grey must be counted one. Thirty-six years from the day when he first exercised autocratic power over the islands of New Zealand Sir George Grey took the oath of allegiance to the Governor and became Premier of the House of Legislature and led the Parliament of those sunny lands until 1891. Many a time and oft was he in opposition to the Crown, but his fighting was always in the cause of freedom in political opinion. He sowed his grain in a receptive field, and there is no doubt—though the dead politician would be the first to deny it—that a good many of the socialistic fads that now distinguish the legislative enactments of New Zealand owe their initiative and logical outcome to the trains of thought set in motion by the active brain of Sir George Grey.

Mr. Macdona, M.P., has obtained a concession for a railway from Shanghai to Canton along the coast. The Kowloon-Canton railway concession has fallen to Britishers.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"MINT PRICE" FOR SILVER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I would not even, if you would allow it, open a discussion on Bimetallism, but would say in answer to your note at the foot of my remarks of 21st Sept., that I am certain the Bimetallists would be quite content with a "Mint Price" for silver on terms identical in meaning with the "Mint Price" for gold, and as it is quite clear without legislation this happy result cannot be attained, the coinage of silver must remain on entirely a different footing from the coinage of gold which is free and unrestricted.

I have heard the statement that the value of gold is fixed by Act of Parliament over and over again, but I may cite Mr. Holder, one of the S. Australian Ministers, as an instance. He made the statement in my hearing at a public meeting at the Town Hall, Brisbane. With regard to your remark, I cannot admit that the word "Authority" has correlation with any Bimetallist.

Yours, GOLD STANDARD.

Sept. 22, 1898.

[We share our correspondent's unwillingness to engage in a discussion on bimetallism. The subject occupied quite enough of our space seventeen years ago, and has long passed beyond the realm of newspaper controversy. But we repeat that the statement attributed to bimetallists by "Gold Standard" is too manifestly absurd to be endorsed by any sensible man. We note the very contemptuous attitude of our correspondent towards bimetallists in general, and congratulate him and his fellow-thinkers on their splendid confidence in their own doctrine.—Ed. J.M.]

THE DOSHISHA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—Allow me to point out two or three mistakes in the letter of Rev. S. L. Gulick, published in the Japan Times for Friday, Sept. 9th.

I am not commissioned to represent any person or persons in the Doshisha, but happening to know the facts I may, perhaps, make the corrections needed and asked for better even than any one more intimately concerned.

Mr. Gulick, referring to the articles by Mr. Abe in the Christian and the Japan Times, says:—"It is implied throughout both articles that the Doshisha rejected the Protestant and missionary view and takes the 'progressive' theological position." "It is clear," he continues, "that Mr. Abe is not stating merely his own view, but what he understands to be the view of the Doshisha on these matters. Otherwise his argument that the difficulty is wholly a theological one would have no bottom." Then upon this assumption Mr. Gulick proceeds to ask questions and to discuss the situation.

Now is it so "clear that Mr. Abe is not stating merely his own view, but what he understands to be the view of the Doshisha on these matters?" I read Mr. A.'s article as it appeared in the Japan Times, but it never occurred to me that he was speaking for anyone but himself.

But supposing, for a moment, that Mr. Abe did think he was representing somebody beside himself in the Doshisha, is it right or fair to assume in public print that Mr. A. correctly represents what is termed "The Doshisha" before ascertaining from others in the Doshisha whether he really does so or not?

Better that any number of articles should have no bottom than that men be assumed to hold views which you wish to criticise when a little investigation, not to say thought, would suffice to show one that such assumption does injustice by implying that every one in the Doshisha holds such and such views unless he appears in print and repudiates them.

Some men—and everyone knows that this is especially true of the Japanese—rather suffer under an imputation of this kind than seem to publicly criticise a colleague or friend by disclaiming the impeachment.

Some men are not particularly anxious to appear in print even to protect themselves.

But the facts are that Mr. Gulick's assumption is not correct. Mr. Abe was writing as a critic for himself alone as far as the views in question are concerned.

It would have been much better if Mr. Gulick had defined what he meant by "The Doshisha."

Did he mean the body of Japanese teachers in the various schools under the Doshisha management?

If so, then there is no such concensus of opinion as that which is assumed to be, not even among the men most immediately concerned in theological subjects.

Did he mean the Board of Trustees?

Then, again, as he must know, there is no such concensus of opinion or view upon the subject in question.

In this connection it may be interesting and instructive to some to know that of the fifteen Trustees now in Japan—two of the whole number are abroad—there are at least seven (and I may add one more) of whose orthodoxy there is no doubt not even on the part of the missionaries. Of these eight five are prominent pastors, two are prominent business men, and one is a well known lawyer and former Judge.

It seems to me that this fact should have considerable significance and bearing in regard to not only the theological side of the Doshisha question but in regard to the moral side as well.

When such men favour the recent changes, or even acquiesce in them, I begin to wonder whether the changes mean what "the majority" have said they do.

Again, Mr. Gulick is mistaken in claiming that Christianity has been taught compulsorily in the Doshisha "from the beginning until a few years ago."

If Mr. Gulick will look into the first circular of the Doshisha printed in English in 1885 he will find the following note printed at the bottom of page 5: "Attendance on this exercise (i.e. Bible class) is voluntary throughout the course."

Subsequent Catalogues and the Records show that, while the Bible appears as one of the studies, attendance upon it was sometimes voluntary and sometimes required, and that the same was true of attendance upon chapel; though, as might be expected, attendance upon the latter was more often required than upon the former because the chapel exercises were designed to serve other purposes besides a religious purpose.

I am, Sir, Yours truly, C. M. CADY.

Kyoto, Sept. 14th.

KOREAN NOTES.

The engagement of the Beachcomber Brigade, as telegrams to Japanese papers informed us, raised quite a storm in Sŏul. Several days before the men landed we find the Sŏul Independent remarking:—"The Government is spending millions of money to keep up the little army. If His Majesty so far distrusts his own people as to entrust his safety to a band of Foreigners, the evil consequences of the estrangement and jealousy of the soldiers may far outweigh any temporary benefit to be derived from this extraordinary step. When the Russian officers were dismissed from the Body Guard last spring did not the Ministers of His Majesty assure Russia that Koreans were able to take care of themselves? Not a year has gone since this assurance was given and lo, a foreign Body Guard for the Palace! We can not see any cause for congratulation in this unwise and unnecessary departure of the Government. Earnest efforts for reformation, on the part of His Majesty's officials, will soon make the easily satisfied people of Korea happy and contented, and we repeat what we said once before that His Majesty will find his safety better secured in the love of his people than in a battalion of hired bayonets."

The new bodyguard put up at the Bijuo Hotel, but before their services were really requisitioned they received their marching orders. Mr. Greathouse's Shanghai excursion has cost the Korean Treasury a pretty penny.

The Independent has been told that a scheme is afloat to establish in Korea a national bank, under the name of the Bank of Tai Hau. The capital is to be $50,000,000, of which $10,000 will be furnished by the Imperial Household.

The Independent Club is still pegging away. On the 15th September it felt moved to address a letter to the Acting Premier, H.E. Yun Yongsun, on the subject of "Court Whisperers." Naturally the letter was not couched in the language with which we associate Far Eastern memorials. It ran:—

"We have the honour to remind Your Excellency that, in spite of the augustness and sacredness of the Palace, its premises have been invaded night and day by a "crowd of nameless little men," (not including the Ministers of State, and members of the Imperial family) who have obscured the sacred vision of His Majesty and introduced "muddiness" in national politics. The hearts of the people have on this account long been angry and indignant.

"On the night of the 11th inst., unexpectedly, an event of unprecedented (wickedness) happened in the Palace. This was due to the fact that our Prime Minister had neither kept the subordinate officers under proper control, nor expelled a single bad man (from the Government.) Our Club has no other object in view than to protect the interests of the Imperial family with loyalty (to our Sovereign) and love (for our country). We therefore beg that Your Excellency will expel the "crowd of little men" at once in order to keep the Palace clean and undefiled."

Within the next five days, Yun Yongsun found time to compose an answer, and this is what he said:—

"In answer to your communication in regard to the question of clearing the Palace and its premises (of whisperers), I must say that no one can but admire your loyalty and patriotism. I am ashamed to admit that, as the Vice-President of the Council (Acting Premier) I have been able neither to exercise proper control over subordinate officers nor to expel a single bad man from office. But the duties of the Imperial Household are different from those of other departments. I shall therefore refer the matter to the Minister of the Household so that the best measure may be adopted for rectifying the abuses (you have mentioned.)"

A memorialist attached to the Korean Court is disgusted with the system of punishments now inflicted in the peninsula. He thinks they are much too soft and comfortable. In his opinion the recent plots and acts of high treason are all due to the misplaced leniency of the law officers of the Crown. He urged the Emperor to "order the authorities to revive the ancient law of torture, decapitation, etc., in order to prevent any recurrence of disloyal schemes and to render the Imperial family safe." The Independent is horrified at the suggestion and thinks the memorialist deserves punishment for daring to insult the emperor by forwarding such a petition.

CHINESE NOTES.

Shanghai witnessed a big fire on the night of the 17th Sept., when 100,000 taels worth of tea, cotton, and other goods were consumed in a godown on the Kin-lee-yuen wharf belonging to the China Navigation Company. The buildings were insured in the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, while as regards the destroyed goods quite a number of insurance corporations are involved. The cause of the outbreak is not definitely known, but is supposed to be due to spontaneous combustion of cotton.

A melancholy interest attaches to the news published in the Shanghai papers concerning the young Chinese Emperor, prior to Sept. 22nd. In the N.-C. Daily News we find a paragraph relating to his studies. It runs:—His Majesty Kwang Hsü, who during the late war with Japan began studying English and French, has recently given up the latter language and now gives his sole attention to getting a mastery over English literature. His Majesty has a very quick ear and pronounces extremely well, and he devotes two hours' close study daily to his lessons. The Imperial Tutor is a gentleman who has been to the United States, and the determination of his Majesty to push his projects of reform has doubtless been greatly strengthened by this daily, intimate intercourse where official etiquette becomes considerably lessened.

An opium shop on the Shansi Road, Shanghai, caught fire on the 16th, and before the flames were extinguished 13 other houses were destroyed. The property was owned by Messrs. Lester, Schultz, and Dowdall and Hanson. Most of the property was insured, the companies involved being the Hongkong, the North British, and the Imperial.

One of the latest edicts issued by the Emperor Kang Hsü approved of the memorial of Hanlin Bachelor Ting Wei lu suggesting that a National Budget be issued annually, according to Western custom, and commanded the Board of Revenue to make up monthly statements of accounts to be printed and published for the information of the whole empire. Criticisms could then be made and economy in various items of expenditure suggested which might be beneficial to the Empire. "As we are now earnestly prosecuting our schemes of reforms for the country," says the edict, "a National Budget, according to Western customs, is one of the most important matters to be attended to, and it is our earnest hope that good will come out of them all."

Mrs. de T. tried to get Mrs. B.'s amah away from her and actually went to Mrs. B.'s house when she was out and offered the amah more money. The next time the ladies met at a dinner party Mrs. B. took no notice of Mrs. de T. Some one who sat between them said:—

"Mrs. B. you know Mrs. de T., do you not?"

"No—I believe not," said Mrs. B.; "she sometimes calls on my amah, I understand!"—Foochow Echo.

Two natives of Shanghai named Chang and Wan having, it appears, invented a certain kind of ornamental incandescent electric light, applied recently to Tsai Taotai for a patent in accordance with the recent Imperial edict granting such privileges to inventors, etc. Tsai Taotai, the N.-C. Daily News learns, has reported favourably to Viceroy Liu on the subject, recommending that a patent be granted to the two artisans with the sole right to make the lights for 15 years.

The new copper cash coined from the foreign mint of the Hupeh Viceroyship were lately put on the Hankow market and are greatly appreciated by the people. The new cash are somewhat smaller in size than those coined at Canton, but they are of greater weight.

Writing on Sept. 20th, the N.-C. Daily News said that there seemed to be considerable excitement in Fukien province over the movements of the Kwangtung and Kwangsi rebels, and dispatches are to hand to the effect that a large body of malcontents from a place on the Kukien coast called Yangkou, belonging to Yenpingfu prefecture, have raised the flag of rebellion, headed by several well-known and wealthy notables of the first-named town. So also in the district of Shouning, in Funing prefecture, several risings have taken place, culminating in the union of all the insurgent bands into a formidable whole. The Viceroy Pien has sent troops to quell this rebellion.

Judging from an Imperial decree telegraphed to Shanghai under date of Sept. 17, Kang Yu-wei, the now proscribed reform leader, had already incurred the Emperor's displeasure by staying too long in Peking. The edict ran:—We are surprised to find that, although we appointed Kang Yu-wei Chief Editor of the official Chinese Progress magazine at Shanghai, some time ago, the said Kang Yu-wei is still staying at Peking. In our anxiety for the education of our subjects and the difficulty of procuring men of education and enlightenment to assist us in our work, we were pleased to find in Kang Yu-wei a man of this calibre, and so as soon as he had an audience with us we at once commanded that he should undertake the direction of the magazine in question, as we were of opinion that newspapers were one of the most important instruments for educating officials and people, and our appointment of Kang Yu-wei showed our confidence in him to undertake an important office. He has now all the funds he requires for his work and we command that he make no further delay in going to Shanghai."

News is slowly reaching Shanghai of the devastations recently caused in Shantung province by another outburst of China's perennial "sorrow." In one letter we find the following sentences:—"This time the floods are more appalling and disastrous than any within living memory—at least so it is reported. Villages swept away by the hundred, tens of thousands ruined and homeless, crouching on the banks under the pitiless rain." Another writes:—"The floods have issued forth near the old site of Chitung city, and are sweeping the lowlands to the east to a width of 20 miles in places, and finding an outlet at the junk-boat station of Yang-chuehkou, where the canal from Chinanfu enters the sea. This area is not densely populated, comparatively speaking, being for the most part an alkaline plain. Some two hundred villages are said to have been flooded—a low estimate according to the extent of the flood. Hundreds of refugees are flocking to the cities along the southern border of the devastated region."

The great Southern Viceroy, Chang Chih-tung, has decided to start a manufactory of smokeless powder. A foreign chemist has been engaged, the necessary machinery purchased, and working will commence as soon as the necessary buildings are completed.

The Peking Gazette announces that Sept. 27th was the date for changing the summer hat for the winter head-covering.

A native of Canton recently appeared at the yamên of the Court of Censors with a magnified air-gun he had apparently made, with a request that it should be presented to the Emperor and that if acceptable he desired to have a monopoly of the manufacture for a certain term of years. The N.-C. Daily News remarks that it was further stated that the air-gun is made to "fire" dynamite shells of a couple of ounces weight.

The Universal Gazette's Wuchang correspondent reports the arrival at that port of 10,000 additional spindles for the Hupeh Cotton Weaving Mills, the machinery having been ordered through the agency of Messrs. Arnhold, Karberg and Co., of Shanghai.

The Universal Gazette states that owing to the overflow of the banks of the Fêng river, caused by recent incessant rains, the northern end of the Grand Canal, in the district of Wutsing, near Peking, commencing from the populous market town of Yangchun to a place called Hanyangpu, a distance of fifteen to twenty miles, is one inland sea of muddy water. All the towns and villages en route are under water, with the waves rolling several feet above the highest point, the area inundated being estimated at about 100 square miles or so.

The Peking and Tientsin Times of the 17th inst. said that Sir Claude Macdonald passed through Tientsin on his way to Peitaiho on the 14th.

The eldest son of the Rev. J. Gilmour, of Mongolia, has been accidentally killed by falling over a cliff at Port Rush. He was in training to become a medical missionary.

The Emperor in one of his latest edicts strictly prohibited the purchase of office in future. Alas, that the era of reform should have been a short-lived.

The N.-C. Daily News gives the following account of a recent bicycle accident at Shanghai:—A young lady, Miss Gill, was cycling along the pathway near the entrance to the Recreation Club when by some means or other she lost control of the machine and rode clean into the creek, which at the time contained not less than two and a-half feet of water. She was rescued by some members of the Recreation Club, her clothes in a saturated condition, and herself evidently very much unnerved. In consequence, however, of the recent Municipal Order as to 'rickshas she had to walk drenched from head to foot a quarter of a mile before she could proceed expeditiously on her way to the house of Dr. Zedelius, where she is engaged as governess; and that too on a chilly evening, clad in summer attire.

The N.C. Daily News has the following remarks to offer on the cotton-mill strike at Shanghai:—

It appears that an arrangement was come to on the part of the masters whereby the system of payment should be changed from time to piece work,—the origin of so many labour disturbances at home. The result was notified to the workpeople, but was not received in the majority of instances in a favourable spirit, so much so that in consequence of the small number of hands returning to work at the Soy Chee Cotton Mills the premises had to be shut down after the midday meal. There were also signs of discontent at the Laou Kung Mow Mill, but, although an indifferent system of intimidation was practised on the part of the women at Soy-chee, work at Messrs. Jardine and Matheson's Ewo factory was conducted without the least outward signs of disapproval. That a labour struggle has been initiated there can be no doubt, but it is not thought that it will assume any more serious proportions. Should it, the action of the workpeople will, in the opinion of an expert, recoil on their own heads, as the movement will only tend to lower the price of cotton. The cause of the dispute may not be far distant from the fact that Chinese compradores are engaged at certain places whilst at others, as at Ewo, the hands are paid direct.

Writing on Sept. 22nd, the N.-C. Daily News stated that the dispute in the local cotton industry at Yangtsepoo had been very much minimised and any serious interruption to trade was not anticipated. "The whole affair originated with the Soey Chee people, this mill being practically governed by the compradore, though the proposed change in the scale of wages would not really affect the operatives, that is to say except the loafers. The change from day wages to contract or piece work has been rendered necessary by the increasing competition from the Indian markets, the machines in the Bombay districts obviously turning out more yarn (though of precisely the same pattern), than those in Shanghai. It consequently became equally obvious that the operatives did not succeed in producing all the machinery was capable of and by paying them per production it would stimulate them to greater efforts. One mill manager with an extensive experience of Indian mills states that so far from the average operative suffering from the change she would be able without doubt to very much increase her wages, and the alteration would enable the management to discover who were the bees and who the drones. Full and adequate notice had been given of the proposed change, but it was not until Monday, when the new scheme came into operation, that any noticeable disapproval was manifested. On the following day, Tuesday, the Soey Chee people struck and a number of them intimidated the workers at the Laou Kung Mow Mill with such effect that after the midday interval only about twenty-five per cent. resumed work. When the tactics of Soey Chee became known the manager of the Ewo Mill locked the employés in and work was continued without the least trouble or murmuring. The Yah Loong Mill happens to be closed, and will remain so for a couple of weeks or so pending considerable internal alterations and enlargements. Yesterday work at the Soey Chee Mill was suspended, but of the malcontents at Laou Kung Mow the great majority resumed their labours, and over two-thirds of the entire employees were at work, whilst the Ewo Mill was, as on the previous day, in full swing. There is likewise no trouble at the International Mill, where the hands are still paid by the day, the change always have been. The disruption is not regarded by the masters as anything but a temporary ebullition of ill-feeling on the part of a number of lower class workers egged on by a certain small number of individuals who would suffer by the change to direct payment. A few appearances in the Mixed Court would doubtless clinch matters."

In local mandarin circles at Shanghai it is stated that the authorised bank note issue of the Imperial Bank of China will for the present be of the total value of Tls. 1,500,000, namely, one million dollars in dollar notes of various denominations, and Tls. 500,000 in tael notes. Of these bank notes to the value of $650,000 and Tls. 315,000 have already arrived for circulation, divided as follows:—150,000 one dollar notes; 30,000 five dollar notes and 35,000 ten dollar notes; also 65,000 one tael notes; 30,000 five tael notes and 10,000 ten tael notes.

The N.-C. Daily News is in receipt of a telegram from Peking which says that the Chief of the Commission coming to Japan to study the educational system of this country, the Hanlin bachelor Li Shêng, who, by the way, is a resident of Shanghai, has been instructed by the Tsung-li Yamên to take over the post of acting Minister to the Court of Tokyo in the event of his arriving here upon the expiration of office of H.E. Yü Kêng, the present Chinese Minister, and to remain as acting Minister under the arrival of H.E. Huang Chun-hsien in October next.

The following Wuchang notes are from the Universal Gazette:—The Hupeh cotton spinning and weaving mills at Hanyang are now running short time. Business since spring had been exceedingly good, most of the output having been sent to the order of Szechuan merchants. Lately, however, owing to the bankruptcy of a number of Szechuan hongs, aggregating it is said a total of something like three million taels, there has been no money to take over the yarn and piece goods of the two mills in question, in consequence of which the authorities there now have nearly 3,000 bales in excess on their hands.—A putdey from Lanchou, Kansu, lately arrived to take over a large quantity of Mauser rifles, ordered through Messrs. Carlowitz & Co., of Shanghai, the money for which is to be paid by Viceroy Chang from the annual contribution of Hupeh to the military exchequer of Kansu and Chinese Turkestan. This consignment of arms and ammunition filled over a dozen junks.—H.E. the Viceroy, in his scheme for the widening of streets of the provincial capital, intends to make house-owners on either side of the streets give up a strip of land equal to three feet in width, a uniform compensation being given at the rate of Tls. 40 per foot.

H.E. Chang Chih-tung is leisurely pursuing his schemes of progress far removed from the turmoil of Peking Court intrigues. Just lately he announced his intention of building an Observatory in connection with one of his new Colleges of Western Learning in Wuchang, and a very large-sized and powerful telescope is to be ordered from abroad for it.

Rumours were circulating in Peking about the 18th or 19th that "owing to His Majesty the Emperor's recent indisposition and, further, on account of the immense amount of extra business arising from the inauguration of his reforms, Her Majesty the Empress Dowager may very likely return to the active direction of affairs again, in order to lessen the Emperor's labours." Very specious.

Writing from Wei-hai-wei on Sept. 16th, the correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News remarked:—

Inside, the bay off Liukungtao looks quite bare of ships once more. Four or five days since Admiral Seymour and most of the fleet again went out for a cruise. I understand they were to spend a day or two at Chefoo and then divide up, some of the ships going to Taku, the remainder to Newchwang. It is also said that the Admiral is to pay a visit to Port Arthur on one of the destroyers. In about a week they are expected to return here. In the meantime the Grafton and Undaunted, with the destroyers, are still with us, and the Waterwitch continues her survey work. For about four months past the Chinese training ship Fuchi has been in the harbour. I hear that she leaves to-morrow for Chefoo en route for Tientsin, but she probably return to Wei-hai wei in about two weeks.

Commander Grant has been appointed, for six months, Naval Commissioner of Wei-hai-wei. He has made an energetic and capable Warden of Linkungtao and will doubtless in this higher office give satisfaction.

It is said that two battleships and a destroyer will be stationed here for the coming winter. The rest of the ships will go South. There is talk of Admiral Seymour in company with Sir Claude Macdonald taking a voyage up the Yangtze this autumn, on one of the destroyers. It is surely well that the highest English officials stationed in China should now and then in person visit that region. Such a journey on such a craft can scarcely be called a pleasure trip.

An examination for the Imperial Clansmen to be sent to travel in foreign countries was held recently, the result being that out of 50 candidates 12 were selected.

A member of the Board of Punishment recently memorialized the Throne pointing out that while the import trade of China continues steadily to increase, the export of her staple products, tea and silk, as steadily declines, and he urged that steps be adopted to revive the cultivation of both staples by means of practical schools with experts at their head to study these two branches of industry. The memorial was approved, and it was commanded that steps be taken for the establishment of industrial schools in each province for the study of sericulture and tea cultivation on the most modern lines. Will this reform be carried out now?

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The new P. & O. steamer Isis arrived at Port Said on the 16th ult. with the passengers who left London on the 12th, a transit of four days from London to Port Said.

The cook of the ship Dunfermline, Charles Bithery, who committed a murderous assault on Edwin Poole, mate of the vessel, was convicted at Shanghai before Mr. F. S. A. Bourne, Assistant Judge, and sentenced to one year and eleven months' imprisonment.

The American kerosene ship, whose wreck was reported yesterday in a Nagasaki telegram, was the Earl of Hopetoun, as we correctly surmised. The disaster took place on the 8th September in the Gaspar Straits, while on a voyage from Philadelphia to Nagasaki. The Captain, when seen by a Free Press representative, declined to give any information respecting the loss of his ship.

Late on Tuesday night a young Goanese named Caetano Xavier Cobral, employed as a baker on the P. and O. steamer Formosa, overbalanced himself while stepping on the gangway of the ship from the Pier. He sank immediately, being probably stunned by falling against some portion of the Pier. The body has not yet been recovered.

A seaman named Castella, belonging to the ship Manuel Llaguno, has been conveyed to the International Hospital at Kobe suffering from serious injuries inflicted by a fall from the 'tween decks of the vessel down the fore peak. It appears, says the Kobe Herald, that the poor fellow was handing up a piece of wood to one of his shipmates who was on the upper deck, and, not noticing that one of the hatches by the side of him was off, stepped on one side and fell in the hold. He brought up on the keelson with a fearful crash, and then bounded over and his head struck the ship's side. When picked up he was insensible. His scalp was smashed in, and blood was oozing copiously from his nose and mouth. He has also sustained severe internal injuries, having, it is surmised, fallen on his chest in the first instance. The man is in a precarious condition.

"W.D.H." writes as follows in The American Soldier (Manila) in the course of an article on the political future of the Philippines:—It is obvious, which each day makes more evident, that this climate is not adapted to American physiques, by the large sick lists and intense discomfort of those required to perform duties which are based upon the capacity of the individual in a temperate climate. I feel sure that if a vote were taken in the invading American army to-day it would overwhelmingly favour our relinquishing the Philippines, except as to coaling and trading privileges. The experiment of Americanizing Cuba and Porto Rico must be given a fair trial before we add to the difficulty of the problem by annexing land on the opposite side of the globe, in a latitude which tends to weaken physical and mental powers.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before R. G. E. Forster, Esq., Acting Consul-General.

Tuesday, Sept. 27th.

THE CASE OF EDWARDS: AN EXTRAORDINARY STATEMENT.

Maurice Edwards Brown, alias Max Edwards, alias C.M. Edwards Baines, was charged on remand with obtaining goods by false pretences from Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Messrs. Brett & Co., and a Japanese tradesman at Kobe.

Mr. Ohashi, Assistant Procurator of the Yokohama Saibansho, stated that the prosecutor in the third case, Nako Yataro, of Kobe, had decided not to press the case, and he (Mr. Ohashi) had therefore to apply that it be withdrawn.

Mr. Forster assented.

The evidence of the various witnesses was then read over, and the usual warning given to the accused.

He elected to make a statement, and the following was taken down:

On the 18th July I went down to Messrs. Kelly and Walsh about 10 a.m. I bought some cigars and a novel to the extent of yen 17.35. I told him I would pay at the end of the month if he would send the bill to No. 2 Bluff. He asked me to give him a receipt, which I did so. I wrote the name of M. Edwards, the name I was known in Yokohama. He give the goods and I went home. At the same time I went to Messrs. Brett and Company and obtained some perfume and a bottle of capsules to the extent of yen 8.50. I told him to send the bill to No. 2 Bluff at the end of the month, and I would pay for them. He agreed. He gave me a piece of paper to write my name and address for a receipt, which I did so. I wrote the name of the Edwards, as I could not give any other name, as I was known in Yokohama as Edwards. He trusted me with the goods, and I left the shop and went home. At the same day at about six p.m. I was at the Club Hotel. Immediately afterwards I met Mr. Harry Sharp, of Kelly and Walsh's. He took me to one of the corners, and asked me if I would pay for the goods which I obtained in the morning. As I did not have it at that time in my pocket I told him I would pay at the end of the month. He sent the bill to No. 2 Bluff. He said I was not stopping at No. 2 Bluff, I told him if he wanted proof I would give it him. He said he would not have the proof, but he wanted to have the money the same evening. If I did not pay him he would hand me over to the Japanese authorities. I told him then that I was frightened, and said in two days' time I would pay him the money, and asked him to wait till I could write a letter to my manager. After then he left and went away. I went home, as I had some money to the extent of yen 9, and came down to look for Mr. Sharp to pay him some money and the remainder I'll pay him later on. But I did not find him. I went home and after dinner came down again; to the Grand Hotel to look for him. I did not find him. Immediately afterwards, while I was coming out from the Grand Hotel, I met the chemist of Brett and Company, the man who sold me the goods at the shop. He asked me if I would pay for the goods which I obtained in the morning. I told him "I cannot do so at the present moment, as I have made arrangements with you that the money is to be paid at the end of the month." I however, gave him back the bottle of capsules, which I had in my pocket. He asked me if I would come down to the shop with him to see the manager, who is supposed to be Mr. Thomas. As soon as I entered the shop by the back door Mr. Thomas came down. As soon as Mr. Thomas saw me he told his assistant to call for a policeman and give me in charge, as I had obtained goods under false pretences. While the assistant had gone for the policeman I asked Mr. Thomas what was the matter; I would pay for the goods just now without any further trouble. He declined to do so, and said he must have me arrested by the Japanese authority and put in gaol. I took out six dollars to give him. He refused to take it. He said he must keep me in gaol. He said, "It is not a matter of six dollars; as you have taken from several people the Yokohama goods under false pretences." I told him that had nothing to do with him as long as I paid. In the meantime his assistant came with the policeman. He told his assistant and the policeman to take me over to the police station, and kept there that night till the next day. When we came to the Police Station he stated his affair to the Inspector of Police. I stated mine afterwards. The Inspector said he'll have nothing to do with this case; he'll have to apply to the Consul. The Inspector asked me what Consul am I. I told him American, as I thought, my father being an American, I called myself an American too. Before leaving the Police Station he took out the money from my pocket, and showed it to the assistant of Brett and Company. I told him if Mr. Thomas would not accept his bill to be paid he can do anything he likes, as I cannot do anything but pay him. And before he made any reply I left the Police Station. I went home. Next day I was very much busy and could not go and pay my bill at Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, as I had intended to pay nine dollars and the remainder afterwards when I received some money from Kobe. I waited till the evening. I went to the Grand Hotel, as I was expected to see Mr. Harry Sharp there. As I did not find him there, and while I was coming out of the Grand Hotel I met a friend of mine. He told me he saw my name on the paper—that I am to be arrested by the Japanese authority, as none of the Consuls would recognise me. As I did not believe it and wanted to make certain of it I went myself and looked at the paper, which was fact what he had told me. I was ashamed to go home that night, being my name in the paper. Next day I was trying very hard to meet a friend and get some money from him to pay Mr. Harry sharp. But I failed to find him. I said I would go down to see Mr. Kosakabi, a Japanese by whom I was employed, and try with him to arrange things for me. I started for Kobe that day. When I went to Kobe I was looking for him, but it happened that he had some business in Osaka and I had to wait till he comes back. While waiting one day I was at the Boat House at Kobe. Immediately after I left the Boat House European constable and a Japanese detective were waiting at the door for me. I was arrested and brought to the Japanese Police Station. I managed to explain the matter to the Inspector. He let me off. After three days I was arrested again and brought here. I was taken down to the Japanese Saibansho, and there the Judge asked me if I was M. Edwards. I said "Yes." He asked me if I was the person who obtained goods from Messrs. Brett and Co. and Messrs. Kelly and Walsh. I said "Yes" Immediately afterwards I was taken to the Japanese gaol. I was kept a fortnight before I was brought again to the Saibansho. There the Judge asked me a few questions, and then he detained me about one hour till Mr. Harry Sharp and Mr. Thomas came. They explained their matter to the Judge. I did not hear the statement of Mr. Harry Sharp nor of Mr. Thomas, as I was kept down below till they finished their statement, and then I should be sent to the gaol again. But before they took me to the gaol, I asked permission to ask Mr. Thomas a few questions. They asked Mr. Thomas if he was willing to see me, but I determined to see him and ask him a few questions before the Judge. And while I was taken upstairs I asked Mr. Thomas why did he not accept the money which I offered to him in the shop. He said, "It is not a matter of six dollars; it is a thing that you have obtained goods from several other people, and although I spend 100 dollars I will see you convicted." In fact, he did not tell it to me, but told it to the Judge, and he was trying to make it very hard on me. He took the advantage of doing so because he saw me in the hands of the Japanese. And if he had no intention at doing anything to me why did he himself give evidence against me when he was not the person to sell the goods to me and was not present in the shop when the goods were sold to me. And here he did not himself come to give evidence against me, but sent his assistant, which was right. That's all.

The statement was read over, and at his desire the prisoner was allowed to add the following:—If I had the intention of doing forgery could I have not run away when I had the chance then days at Kobe, but my intention was not of doing any forgery at all. My intention was to pay them to avoid further trouble. I should not even have gone to Kobe, but I saw in every paper in Yokohama my name to be arrested, and seeing so I was frightened and went to Kobe, as I have heard several things about the Japanese that if I am in the hand of them I shall be treated badly. And so they have treated me very badly.

Mr. Forster—I cannot go into that. I cannot go into any such matter in the present phase of the case.

Prisoner—Only one sentence, sir. "So they have treated me very badly." That's all.

The Assistant-Judge added this to the statement, and then said, "As I am of opinion this is decidedly a case to go before a Jury I commit you for trial."

Before His Honour Judge WILKINSON.
THURSDAY SEPT. 29TH.

APCAR MICHAEL APCAR versus HENRY MOSS.

This was a case in which the plaintiff, an Armenian by birth but Japanese by adoption, sued the defendant, a house agent, for the return of two copies of a lease alleged to be obtained from him improperly by the defendant.

The petition was as follows:—

1st that the said Henry Moss, the agent of U. Durand, the former owner of the house No. 140 Bluff, at present occupied by me came to my office one day about five months ago and asked me to lend him for a day or two the lease of the said house which I had in my possession as the said U. Durand wanted to sell the said house and the buyer was desirous of seeing the said lease before concluding the purchase, and that thereupon I in good faith handed the said lease to the said Henry Moss, but although five months have passed and I have repeatedly demanded the said lease from the said Henry Moss yet the said lease has not been returned to me.

The plaintiff therefore prayeth:—

(1) That the defendant may be ordered to return to the plaintiff the said lease and the costs of this suit.

(2) That the plaintiff may have such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The answer to the petition was as follows:

That the said Henry Moss, acting on behalf of Mr. U. Durand, did, on or about October 22nd, 1897, draw out a draft of a lease for the letting of the house No. 140-A Bluff and handed it to the said Apcar Michael Apcar for his signature thereto, but he refused to sign it until he had seen the nature of the repairs. Upon consulting with my principal, Mr. U. Durand, he instructed me that if the said Apcar Michael Apcar would not sign it I was to trouble no more about the matter and on or about the 7th of March, 1898, Mr. Durand gave me instructions to sell the property which I did to Mr. Langfeldt. On or about the 12th, of March I called on Mr. Apcar acquainting him of the sale of the property and requesting the return of the unsigned copies of the lease left with him for signature. He handed me one, but I told him I must have both of them, when he handed me the other.

The Plaintiff, sworn, said he was a Japanese subject. In the autumn of last year he took the house 140-A Bluff, which was then in the possession of Mr. U. Durand. Defendant was not at that time acting as Mr. Durand's agent. Witness at the end of September wrote Mr. Durand a letter agreeing to take the house on a three years' lease at 85 dollars a month, and he received a reply on October 1st, "Thanks for your letter. That is all right. I accept it entirely.—U. Durand." Two lease forms were made out and sent to witness, but he did not sign them immediately because he wanted to see repairs executed to his satisfaction first. As a matter of fact he had never signed them at all. On September 29th defendant wrote as Mr. Durand's agent agreeing that repairs should be effected, but that no additions should be made to the house. Some time later defendant came and asked him for his lease, which he said he wished to show to Mr. Langfeldt. Witness said "You will return them," and defendant replied "Yes." He then gave defendant the two unsigned copies of the lease. Witness paid one month's rent after this incident, and, then finding the lease was not returned, he told defendant he should pay no more rent until it was given back. Defendant said he would try to get it back and witness paid him a month's rent on that promise. It did not arrive, however, and after waiting some time witness again went for it, but defendant declined to give it up. Witness was ejected from the house by order of the Japanese court. He had never refused to sign the lease; he was only waiting for the repairs to be effected. The repairs were not finished when he gave back the lease. He had had to get another house at heavy rent, and he must claim 5,000 dollars damages for the loss and inconvenience he had undergone.

The Judge—You have not made any claim for 5,000 dollars.

Plaintiff—Well, I think the Court —

The Judge—No, you have made no claim of the kind, and I must confine my attention for the present to the case as it stands.

Defendant, on being asked if he had any question to ask, said there was no agreement, but only a proposal for an agreement between plaintiff and Mr. Durand.

The Judge—Of course there is an agreement Mr. Moss. You received rent, didn't you? Was there not an agreement to pay rent?

Defendant—No signed agreement.

His Honour—There was an agreement, that is, clear.

Defendant, in cross-examination, said the house was unsafe without proper repair in an earthquake country like Japan. He was not going to have his wife and children killed for defendant's sake. Great pieces of plaster fell from the ceilings in an earthquake. It was untrue that he had driven workmen away; he had merely kept them away from a room where his wife was lying ill. He was always willing to sign the lease when the house was repaired. He agreed to let Mr. Langfeldt, who bought the house and another gentleman look over the house. He handed the leases to defendant as a gentleman and in good faith.

Ecca da Silva, a Portuguese subject, said one day he was in plaintiff's office on business when defendant called. Mr. Moss asked for a cheque for rent. Plaintiff said he was not going to pay until the lease was returned. Defendant said, "Well, the property's sold; and you don't want the lease." Plaintiff said, "I have nothing to do with the sale of the property: I want my lease back. I only know Mr. Durand, and he supports the existence of a lease." Defendant said "Well, you give me a cheque, and I will send you the lease to-morrow." Plaintiff said "You are sure you will do so," and then gave defendant a cheque.

Cross-examined—He did not hear defendant tell plaintiff that a lease without two signatures was mere waste paper. He would swear positively that he said, "Give me a cheque and I will send it next morning." It was on that consideration that plaintiff gave him the cheque.

Plaintiff at this point again commenced to speak about damages.

The Judge—Oh, that is outside the case. The case is only as to these pieces of paper.

Defendant—But they are no use to me. I have left the house now, and if I get the lease it is no use to me.

The Judge—That is all I can decide at the present moment, whether the lease shall be returned or not. When that is decided you can of course take any further action as you may be advised. That is all I can say.

Defendant was then called to give his version. He stated when he went to plaintiff he said he had received instructions from Mr. Langfeldt, who had bought the house from Mr. Durand, to get back the unsigned leases. He asked plaintiff to let him have them and plaintiff said, "Yes," and gave him one, but witness said, "I must have both," whereupon he handed witness the other. Then he asked witness, "Will you bring them back?" Witness's answer was, "I don't know, but I think not." Plaintiff afterwards declined to pay the rent unless he was given back the leases, and witness told him that he had no leases, that the lease forms were signed by one party only, that plaintiff had refused to sign them, and that they would be no use to him if he had them back. Plaintiff, however, said he would not pay the rent until he got back the leases. He afterwards put the matter into the hands of the owner, and had since had no communication with plaintiff. The lease forms were in plaintiff's possession for over five months, and the house had been put in good repair outside, and only wanted a little cleaning inside. It had since been resold by Mr. Langfeldt to Mr. Feicke.

His Honour, in giving judgment, said—I consider the documents ought to be returned to the plaintiff. It seems to me only necessary to say that I am satisfied that the plaintiff was under the impression that the defendant had promised to return them to him. I do not say that that belief was purposely induced by the defendant. If that were the case I should endeavour to have the services of a jury. But I am satisfied that it was induced by the words he used, and that if he had allowed the plaintiff to believe that they would not be returned he would not have given them up. Whether the documents can now be if any use and if so what use to the plaintiff it is not necessary to consider. I decide that he intended to have them, and the order will be that the plaintiff is entitled to have the documents delivered to the plaintiff forthwith, and that the defendant do deliver them accordingly and pay 24 yen, the costs of the Court.

Defendant—The documents are not mine.

His Honour—The Court has them now. It is very lucky for you they are in Court and that they are not in any one else's possession. The order is that the Registrar deliver them to the plaintiff.

On the application of the defendant His Honour allowed a week's delay in the delivery of the documents for the defendant to consider with his friends as to any further action they might take.

REPORTED ASSASSINATION OF THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

LI HUNG-CHANG'S PARTY SUSPECTED.

Shanghai, Sept. 23, 2.19 p.m.

A report has reached here from Peking that the Emperor of China has been assassinated. That is the news as it is current in Shanghai, but I am inclined to believe that the story has been exaggerated, and that His Majesty has been simply deposed. It is also reported that Kang Yu-wei, the head of the Reform Party, is accused of the murder, and that the gates of Peking have been closed to prevent his escape. The Taotai of Shanghai has offered two thousand dollars reward for Kang Yu-wei's arrest, and vessels arriving from the north are rigorously searched. Many persons here believe that if the Emperor has been assassinated, the efforts of his murderers are being directed to fix the guilt upon Kang, but that Li Hung-chang and his party are really guilty.

THE EMPEROR STILL ALIVE.

Shanghai, Sept. 23, 6 p.m.

The Shanghai Mercury this afternoon received from Peking what it believes to be authentic information to the effect that the Emperor is alive.

KANG YU-WEI ARRESTED AT SHANGHAI.

BRITISH CONSUL INTERVENES.

Shanghai, Sept. 24, 6.15 p.m.

Kang Yu-wei, the Reform leader, who is charged with administering poison to the Emperor Kwang Hsü, has arrived in Shanghai by the British steamer Chungking. He was at once arrested by the Chinese officials, but the British Consul objected to the proceedings of the Chinese officials and protested against the arrest. Kang Yu-wei, in the meantime, has been taken aboard H.B.M.'s war vessel Esk, now lying in the river.

LI HUNG-CHANG AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Peking, 24th Sept., 1.50 p.m.

The commotion has almost ended. Strong measures will probably be confined to the party of Kang Yu-wei. It was reported that H.E. Chang Yin-yuen had been arrested, but such is not the case. Li Hung-chang is desirous of resuming office, but the idea meets with opposition from the British.

sense that the arrest of prominent men had temporarily ceased. From this morning the arrests have recommenced, and many have been made in Shanghai and Tientsin. Chang Yin-Yuen was at the dinner given yesterday by Prince Ching to Marquis Ito, but vigorous measures are now being taken to apprehend him.

ILLNESS OF PRINCE CHING.

Peking, 25th Sept., 4.48 p.m.

Chang Yin-yuen has been deprived of his office and handed over to the Board of Punishments. Prince Ching is reported to be sick. His illness is supposed to mark his disapproval of the measures taken with regard to Chang Yin-yuen.

[Prince Ching, referred to in the above telegrams, was recently appointed to the post of Ching Superintendent of Octroi in Peking, an office yielding about 100,000 taels yearly to its holder. Prince Ching, just before receiving this valuable post, had been nominated President of the Board of Rites, vice Huai Ta-pu, who was among the officials cashiered for refusing to present Wang's memorial to the Throne. The report sent from Peking by the Fiji Shimpo's correspondent, that Prince Ching had proposed to Li Hung-chang the deposition of the Emperor, seems very difficult to credit.—Ed. J. M.]

THE EMPRESS-DOWAGER AND LI.

Peking, 11.40 a.m., Sept. 23.

At midnight last night the ceremony of installing the Empress-Dowager was performed. The Palace was strictly guarded by troops. Prince Kung and others proposed to Li Hung-chang that the Emperor should be deposed, but Li would not agree, and the method of investing the Empress Dowager with Regent's powers was resorted to. Several advocates of reform have been arrested, but the rest have made good their escape. The Russians are observing the action of the Japanese with close attention.

THE EMPRESS DOWAGER ASSUMES REGENCY.

Shanghai, Sept, 23.

On the 21st an Imperial Edict was issued announcing that the Empress Dowager would attend to Government affairs as Regent.

A telegram has since been received from Peking that the Chinese Emperor is dead.

The Taotai of Shanghai has issued an order for the arrest of the supposed guilty party. A reward is also offered for his apprehension.

ARREST OF REFORMISTS.

Peking, Sept. 26.

The previous intelligence to the effect that Kwan Yu-wei has been arrested was incorrect. Eight persons have been taken into custody, including Chang Yin-yun, and these were all pro-English and pro-Japanese.

Peking, 7 a.m., Sept. 24.

Chung Yang-un has been arrested at Tientsin on a charge of complicity. It is said that the Emperor has been already imprisoned in the Palace and that he is rigorously guarded by soldiers.

Shanghai, Sept. 26.

Chang Yin-wan, Liang Chi-chao, and 14 other reformists have been arrested in Peking. Most of the followers of Kwang Yu-wei in this city have made their escape.

PEKING QUIET.

Peking, Sept. 28.

Peking is very quiet. Only seven persons are now under arrest for political reasons.

KANG YU-WEI.

Hongkong, Sept. 28.

Kang Yu-wei arrived here from Shanghai by the P. and O. steamer Ballarat, which he boarded at Woosung.

Peking, Sept. 29.

It has been decided by the Court that Chang Yin-wan has no connection with Kang Yu-wei. He is, however, still kept in jail

CAN THIS BE CREDITED?

His Majesty the Chinese Emperor has ostensibly resumed the reins of Government, and the offices which were closed have been re-established.

PINNING THE K Kt.

Pinning the K Kt by B to K 5 is a fad with very many players. They always do it, and they do it as soon possible. We are acquainted with several pinnists who ride this hobby so far as to offer it as a defense to the Ruy Lopez, play 3—P to Q 3, and 4—B to Kt 5. Lasker says:—"Don't pin the K Kt until you have Castled." In other words:—B to K Kt 5 is a weak move when your game is in an undeveloped condition. One of the smartest examples of taking advantage of this that we have seen is found in the following little skit between Mieses and Oehquist:—

Notes (abridged) by Emil Kemeny, in The Ledger, Philadelphia.

(a) This gives Black the majority of Pawns on the Queen's wing, and by continuing P to Q R 3 and P to Q Kt 4 Black's position will be a pretty safe one. The general opinion is that Black thus obtains an advantage, and most players avoid a similar development by delaying the capture of the Q P until Black has moved P to Q B 4, when an exchange of both Pawns takes place. White in the present might have played P takes B P instead of Q to K 2. Mr. Pillsbury, however, prefers the present development. He believes, that by correct play he can prevent Black from making headway on the Queen's wing, while an advantage may be gained by White in the center or on the King's side. The play is hardly in accordance with the principles of "modern Chess," yet it seems to yield very satisfactory results, at least so, if Pillsbury handles the White forces.

(b) This promising-looking play has a serious disadvantage. White Kt at K 5 will remain in a commanding position and Black has no proper reply to the threatening P to Q R 4 move. Had Black kept his Kt at Q 2, White could not so successfully continue P to Q R 4, for then Kt takes Kt and Q to Q 2 would have been answered by Black. If Black intended to move his Kt to B 3, he should have played P to K B 3 first. If then Kt to Kt 4 Black moves P to K 4, followed by Kt to B 3, and the P to Q R 4 may be answered with Kt to Q 4 and eventually with Kt takes Kt. Black then would be able to maintain his advantage on the Queen's wing. The text move gives White the preferable game.

(c) Which loses a Pawn, yet Black was unable to avoid it.

(d) An ingenious move, which, however, does not prove satisfactory.

(e) Better than B takes P, followed by R takes Kt, for in that case Q takes B, Q to B 8 ch, and Q takes R P would have given White an easy win.

(f) A powerful move, which completely paralyzes the Black forces. Black now is unable to move either King or Bishop, and his position is hopeless.

(g) The position is a very instructive one. Black can move only his R P or his Rook. If P to B 4, then P to Kt 4 K to Kt 3, K to B 4, and K takes P follow. If Black moves his Rook, he must keep it on the Q B file, in order to prevent the Kt to B 7 play of White, which would either win the exchange or bring about an exchange of Rook and Knight against the Rook and Bishop. If Black plays R to B 5, R to B 7, or R to B 8, White continues K to Kt 3, P to B 4, K takes P, K to B 5, P to K 4, etc., winning easily.

MORE NOTES ON THE VIENNA TOURNEY.

In commenting on the Vienna Tournament, the Chess Editor of the Hereford Times remarks that he doubts if the title of Chess Champion is worth very much to any one who has not defeated Dr. Tarrasch in a match,

It is stated that Mr. Pillsbury attributes his indifferent play in the last ten days of the tournament entirely to exhaustion, and that in comparison with his appearance two months ago he looks a physical wreck.

Walbrodt has already been mentioned as the eccentric competitor of this tournament, and an incident occurred which shows that he is keeping up his character. He had to play Tarrasch an important game upon which depended whether the latter or Pillsbury would take thelead. His non-arrival, after his clock had been going an hour and a half, caused no little excitement, but he at length arrived, calmly sat down to his board, made his move, and then quietly opened his voluminous correspondence and read his letters. This matter disposed of, he ordered his frugal morning coffee, lighted his cigar, and then only he settled down to work, having lost a Pawn in the meantime as a preliminary of the day's work. This was only what was expected, and all were waiting for the news that Tarrasch had won the game. The sole undisturbed person in the room, however, was Walbrodt. Not only did he not lose the game, but he held his own, disdained to capture the Pawn he had lost—of which he had opportunities—and when time was called for adjourning he had accomplished in half an hour's time what it took his opponent two hours to accomplish. Then, to everyone's amusement, after the game was resumed Dr. Tarrasch was short of time, whilst Walbrodt had plenty to spare, and at a late hour the doctor had to be satisfied with a draw.

In Dr. Tarrasch we have a player who, while possessing a sound, cautious, though a more laborious style of play than Pillsbury or any of his other contemporaries, is also a tournament champion who has achieved greater success in such contests than any living player. It will be remembered that he has won four international tournaments, with the loss (accidentally) of one game only, in succession. His victory at Vienna, crowning as it does all his previous achievements, undoubtedly therefore marks him out as the strongest player of his time, who in a set match must be considered as second to none, with the exception, perhaps, of Lasker alone.—Daily News.

The Australasian says a few humorous incidents were noted during the progress of the tourney:—Mr. Showalter had king, rook, bishop, and three pawns, but did not succeeded in scoring a win against Mr. Pillsbury, who had king, rook and bishop; Dr. Tarrasch won from Mr. Baird, but not till he had overlooked a mate in three; Herr Schlecter, who had an even position with Herr Maroczy, made an illegal move, and lost the game though having to submit to the penalty of moving his king; and Mr. Blackburne, who had a choice of winning from M. Janowski by any one of several simple variations, showed extraordinary ingenuity in discovering the only line of play that gave his opponent the chance of escaping with a draw.

The Glasgow Herald has the following interesting remarks:—

In the deciding match of four games between Tarrasch and Pillsbury, Tarrasch won two Pillsbury one, and one game was drawn, and thus the "Modern School" has again triumphed. We do not use the term in an offensive sense, because undoubtedly Tarrasch must be a chess master of the very highest order, and in playing as he does he only proves himself to be a consummate general as a good chess player.

It may be presumed that everyone who entered the tournament did so with the determination to do his best to win. That was the goal for which they were all striving, and if, in order to succeed in this, one requires not only fine chess powers, but patience, tenacity, shrewdness, and a strong infusion of what might be called German phlegmatic imperturbability combined with Scotch pawkiness, and if these are not to your liking, then you may blame the conditions of the tournament or even the game itself, but you cannot quarrel with the man who proves that nature has pre-eminently endowed him with the qualities necessary to win.

It certainly cannot be said that, however, sound and safe it may be, Tarrasch's style (or perhaps we should say the style he adopts in such tournaments, for he can be brilliant and dashing on occasion) is calculated to arouse enthusiasm, and the ordinary amateur will confess to a shade of disappointment and regret that the more attractive and sportsmanlike—we had almost said the more manly—style of Pillsbury and Janowski did not carry off the palm. These players, and especially Janowski, will have the consolation of knowing that it is to their games that the public will turn for refreshment and delight, and if Pillsbury needs any consolation he can reflect that after all no one, and least of all Tarrasch, will be inclined to suggest that his final victory over Pillsbury is due to superior chess power or to any other cause than the fortune of war.

Steinitz has strongly and persistently argued that the results of such tournaments afford no criterion of the respective chess powers of the combatants, and while this may have been, and will be true of some men and of some tournaments, these, we think, are exceptions, and that it still remains true that the best men will generally be found about the top.

Now, suppose an ordinary amateur had been asked to name the leading players of the present day, would he not probably have subscribed to the following list:—Lasker, Pillsbury, Tarrasch, Steinitz, Janowsky, Tchigorin, Blackburne, and Burn? Lasker, of course, did not compete at Vienna, but look at the position of the others.

Blackburne's lower place was undoubtedly due to the great strain of such a severe and prolonged contest acting upon a constitution weakened by frequent ill health.

THE markets remain in practically the same condition as last week. As regards imports the healthier tone in yarns and textiles is maintained; in some departments fair business has been done, and in most there are at least signs of awakening activity. In metals some business is doing, and the sugar and kerosene markets show the usual steady aspect. As regards exports the markets are, on the whole, flat. Little has been done in raw silk, and less in waste silk, and in both the large stocks in hand tend to lower prices, though holders are disinclined to give way. Tea, especially the lower grades, is fairly active, though the large quantities still in the country exercise a weakening tendency on prices.

AFFAIRS IN PEKING.

It is difficult to attach any importance to the telegram said to have been received in Tokyo, announcing that the Emperor of China has been restored. Apart from the extreme improbability of such a sudden change, we have the fact, telegraphed from various sources and therefore not to be doubted, that all the sinecures which the Emperor had abolished as part of his scheme of reform have been re-established, and we are therefore in a position to conclude that, whatever nominal share His Majesty may retain in the Administration, he is practically powerless to stem the reactionary current. The offices in question were the Supervisorate of Instruction of the Heir Apparent; the Bureau of Transmission of Imperial Edicts; the Directorship of the Imperial Banquetting Hall; the Directorship of Court Ceremonials; the Mastership of Horse; the High Court of Revision; the Governorships of Kuangtung, Hupeh and Yunnan; the Directorate General of the Yellow River; a number of Grain and Salt Taotaiships and Sub-prefectships, and all the Deputy Sub-prefectships. The yamén of the Supervisorate of the Heir Apparent's Instruction was to be turned into the head-quarters of the Bureau of Mechanical Arts and Commerce, and the yamêns of the other five Courts into colleges of Western learning. It was calculated that the abolition of the above six Boards would throw out of employment five thousand persons, many of whom had paid high prices for their posts with the object of transmitting them to their descendants, according to the Chinese system of hereditary sinecures. The chief officials and secretaries of the Boards were provided for by being turned over to the Board of Railways and Mines and the Board of Agriculture, Art, and Commerce, but the juniors found themselves in evil plight. We speak of the Boards as "abolished," but the fact is that the order for their abolition was given by Imperial Decree on the 1st of September, and that a month was allowed to effect that reform. It seems a reasonable inference that this step, coupled with the cashiering—on the same day as that of the Decree's issue—of the two Presidents and four Vice-Presidents of the Board of Rites for opposing the presentation of a memorial by one of their subordinates on the subject of reform, were the proximate causes of the revolution. As the month allowed for the abolition of the various posts began to draw to its close, the victims of progress found the situation intolerable, and so the plots against the Emperor came to a head. It may also be taken for granted that the re-establishment of all these sinecures indicates the character of the new regimen. Reform is dead and buried, for the present at all events. There was, indeed, little reason to hope for any different result, though, as has already been noted in these columns, many persons in Tokyo were sufficiently optimistic to think that the struggle had been between the extreme radicals and the advocates of moderate reform, and that things would still move in the right groove, though more slowly. That idea is now completely dispelled. Chinese officialdom has turned from the pearl of progress, and is wallowing again in the mud of stagnation. Meanwhile, there are evidences that Li Hung-chang's influence is restored, and that he is acting the part of a peace-maker. We hear of his interceding on behalf of Chang Yin-yuen, and interceding with considerable success. It is by no means improbable that Marquis Ito had some part in this matter. The Marquis made Chang's acquaintance on the occasion of the latter's abortive peace mission to this country in the spring of 1895, and subsequently the two were fellow-passengers from America when returning from the Coronation of the Czar. The day before Chang's arrest, he was present at a dinner given to Marquis Ito by Prince Ching, and the Prince himself seems to have resented the arrest very strongly. The Japanese statesman is not likely to have plunged his hand into the cauldron of complications which it was his lot to witness in Peking, but to the extent of using his good offices with Li on Chang's behalf, he may have made his presence felt.

Marquis Ito does not share the unfavourable opinion entertained by so many persons about Li Hung-chang. The Marquis was interviewed at Chefoo on the 13th instant by a representative of the Osaka Asahi, who probably accompanied him to China. News had just then been received of Li's removal from the roll of Tsung-li Yamén Ministers, which event was announced by Imperial Edict on the 7th instant. The Marquis expressed great regret. He thought that Li had been the victim of slanders, and he predicted that the old statesman would recover his power. It was hard to believe that pro-Russian and pro-English parties had been formed among influential Chinese, for if that were the case, the fate of the Chinese empire would be sealed. There did not seem to be any sufficient reason for regarding Li as pro-Russian. He had negotiated a loan from Russia and had been thrown into more or less close relations with her, but circumstances rather than his own deliberate choice had been responsible for that. As for the talk of his being in Russia's pay it seemed quite incredible. He was an old man. Even supposing him to be so unprincipled the love of wealth must have ceased to sway him, especially as he was already very rich. People blamed him for the result of the war with Japan. In truth he possessed no real power, and therefore could not control events. The Chinese Government did not like to be itself saddled with responsibility but had no compunction about saddling others with the responsibility for its own errors. Li sent a heart-felt complaint to Ito at that very time. "I envy your position," he wrote. "You have power. You can take the initiative. You can advance, if you deem it wise. You can retire, if you consider it prudent. But as for me, I am powerless. I can not advance at will or retire at discretion. I am a puppet." Chang Chih-tung's courageous and resolute utterances about the conservation of Chinese territory had been brought into contrast with the concession made by Li, greatly to the latter's discredit. But Li had made no concessions. His views had not been consulted. He could not choose but obey instructions. The terms of the Shimonoseki Treaty had been dictated to him. The loan from Russia had been dictated to him. His visit to St. Petersburg had been dictated to him. If only folks could post themselves a little more accurately in facts before they set up to be critics, how much more smoothly the world would move. If it was so easy for superficial onlookers to say, why doesn't such and such a statesman do so and so, or why is not a particular step taken by a certain minister; but if they knew the obstacles lying in the way of that act, or the complications involved in this step, they would not be so quick to pass judgment. "You ask me whether China's independence can be preserved long enough for her to complete the reforms necessary for its permanent preservation, I reply that such a question is hard indeed to answer. One can not discover grounds even for confident conjecture. When I was in Europe last year, I did not find that people's minds were much disturbed about the problem. I spoke with a certain well-known statesman on the subject, and laid before him the three sources from which, in my opinion, perils imminently threatened China. They were, first, frontier disputes; secondly, disturbances offering a pretext for foreign interference, and, thirdly, complications growing out of the keen competition and rivalry of foreign Powers. He replied that he did not see any cause for immediate apprehension. Yet, hardly had I returned to Japan when the Kiao-chou incident occurred. Is there any resource, you ask; any plan offering a hope of rescue. Yes, but I am not prepared to submit it for public inspection. I will say, however, that China must cut her way out of the meshes entangling her. If she remains inactive, her collapse is assured. What do I mean by 'cutting her way out,' you want to know. Ah, that is the question. I let it rest there, and pass on to note one of China's most fatal habits, her secretiveness. The Government makes some concession or gives some pledge to one of the Powers, and conceals the fact from all the rest. That is hopelessly unwise. China's best chance of preserving her integrity consists in availing herself of the restraint which the mutual jealousy of the Powers imposes on their several actions. A secret foreign policy is all very well for a strong State which can put out its foot just as far as it pleases in any given direction, but a weak Power must seek to paralyse its opponents by pitting them against each other. You speak of national reforms. Yes, but the renovation of a nation can not be effected merely by edicts from the Throne. Railways may be built and mines worked. Such things are the mere mechanics of progress. Besides, see what the result is in China. Foreign capital is brought in to start these enterprises, and they pass under foreign control by way of security. There is nothing to say against such eventualities in a country which has liberty to make its own laws and power to enforce them; a country where limits can be clearly traced and strictly observed. Japan, for example, is happily so circumstanced. She need not feel the slightest uneasiness even if two-thirds of the shares of her principal railways were in foreign hands. But with China the case is very different. If she gives a railway concession to a foreign syndicate, she may presently find foreign soldiers or gendarmes posted along the route, and virtually exercising military control over the regions through which the line passes. She has to march very warily lest the path of progress itself lead her into serious danger. The want of patriotism on the part of the people is a greater danger, you say. Why, I tell you that before Japan's contact with the outer world made the hearts of all her people beat in unison, she could not claim to show any larger measure of genuine national spirit than the Chinese now exhibit. Patriotism is the common heritage of all nations. The only difference is in the means of exciting it and the machinery for exercising it."

Mob violence in Peking is something very novel. There have been cases of rudeness on the part of soldiers or roughs to individual foreigners, especially in the days when the latter made a habit of taking exercise on the city wall. But the theory generally held has been that the inhabitants of Peking are too heterogeneous to combine into a dangerous mob; that the Chinese, the Tartars, and the Mongolians are not sufficiently intimate with each other to obey any common impulse. We presume that the outrages now reported were perpetrated in the Tartar city by the Manchu inhabitants, for it is among the Manchus that the revolt against progressive innovations has arisen, with its accompaniment of anti-foreign sentiment. Information received in official quarters indicates that the affair was of trifling dimensions and did not result in any injury to life or limb. But it will help to complicate a situation already sufficiently difficult.

Shanghai continues to send out sensational intelligence. The latest is contained in a telegram published by the Tokyo Asahi to the effect that, immediately after the issue of the edict restoring the Empress-Dowager's administrative power, that is to say, on the 22nd ultimo, the Emperor committed suicide. The telegram is dated "9.50 a.m., October 1st," and the language used is emphatic. On the other hand no confirmation of the rumour has been received from Peking, and it is confidently believed in official circles in Tokyo that the Emperor is alive and well. Three reasons are assigned for the belief: first, that, were His Majesty dead, the fact could not be successfully concealed; secondly, that the Empress-Dowager would never have consented to his assassination; and thirdly, that if he had been made away with, a serious commotion, if not a rebellion, must have ensued, whereas all accounts agree that the crisis is over. Undoubtedly these arguments have their value, but are we to conclude that all the rumours so industriously circulated about His Majesty's death are baseless? As to the Empress-Dowager's being morally incapable of conniving at such a crime, we can not forget the fate that overtook Ahluta, the young widow of Tung Chih, immediately after the resumption of power by the two Empresses Dowager in 1875. One thing is quite certain, namely, that Kwang Hsu is very much in the way from the Manchu point of view, and that if the security of the dynasty dictated his partial deposition, the same consideration might indicate a sterner necessity.

It is noteworthy that the accusation against Kang Yu-wei and his confederates has undergone a change, and now takes the form that he plotted to overthrow the Empress-Dowager. That is certainly a more plausible accusation than the original indictment, but both can not be true, and each throws discredit upon the other. The position is very peculiar. There can not be any reasonable doubt that the Chinese Government applied to Great Britain, through Sir Claude Macdonald, to surrender Kang, and, as a matter of course, the application must have been accompanied by a statement of the offence alleged against him, and by a recapitulation of evidence constituting a primâ fâcie case. It may also be taken for granted that the Chinese Authorities are sufficiently familiar with international law not to make such an application unless the nature of the charge warranted it, however superficial the evidence. That Kang had engaged in a political conspiracy would not have been a sufficient charge. No civilized State would surrender a fugitive on that ground. But a plot to take life would be a sufficient charge, and the original allegation, according to rumour, was that Kang had attempted to poison the Emperor. Was that the charge preferred officially by the Chinese Authorities? The thing is almost incredible. We can scarcely imagine that they had so little respect for the British Minister's intelligence, and for their own "face," as to advance a plea of such manifest absurdity. It comes to this, then, that Kang has been hounded out of his country because he sought to introduce reforms, that Chang has been banished to work on the Mongolian post-roads for the same reason, and that six patriotic men of light and learning, Kang's friends and associates, have been condemned to death, and are now awaiting execution, because they, too, would fain had led their country into the path of progress. What are we to say of a Government which perpetrates such crimes? The United States of America has just engaged in extensive and costly operations of war to save a neighbouring people from the effects of bad government, yet the Powers of Europe maintain their Legations in Peking, accredit their Ministers to the Chinese Court, and keep up friendly relations with the Chinese Government, in the face of proceedings which certainly rival anything that happened in Cuba. After all, England will probably be the first to interfere actively in Peking. She is gradually getting drawn into complications which will force her hand.

Among the six Progressists now lying in Peking under sentence of death, two, namely, Leung Kei-Chiu and Hong Kwang-yan, are members of the East Asiatic Society (Ta-a-Kai) of Tokyo. We observe with pleasure that the Society is moving vigorously in their behalf. The Society held a special meeting on the 1st instant, and appointed a Committee to draw up a memorial and present it to Count Okuma, which was done on the following day. The memorialists make a powerful appeal to the Prime Minister to set every possible influence at work on account of the unfortunate men. They point to Great Britain's action in saving Kang Yu-Wei, and to the successful efforts of the Foreign Representatives in Peking and Marquis Ito in obtaining a mitigation of Chang's condemnation, and they plead in the name of mercy, of humanity, and of civilized progress that whatever influence the Japanese Government possesses should be exerted to save Leung and Hong. We imagine that this memorial, timely and becoming as it is, will prove superfluous. It may be taken for granted that not Japan alone but all the Western States having relations with China are already giving their attention to this matter. It will be a wretched and humiliating business if the six Progressists are murdered in the Chinese capital within sight of the flags of the Powers of Christendom.

THE SZECHUAN TROUBLES.

The telegram which we publish elsewhere with regard to Yü Man-tze requires a word of explanation. Yü is the son of a deceased opium-den-proprietor, and is believed to hold high office in the Kalao Hui, which association he joined several years ago. He is part proprietor of a coal mine in Central Szechuan, and although the nick-name "Man-tze" (savage) has been given to him in consequence of his wild and reckless habits of life, he appears to possess great popularity and to wield wide influence in the district where he resides. For a long time he has been under a ban, and many efforts have been made by the officials to effect his capture, but his friends have always succeeded in protecting him. Last June, indeed, he did actually fall into the hands of the Authorities, and was imprisoned in the Yung-chang jail, but his followers speedily effected his rescue. From that time he seems to have made up his mind to pursue a desperate course. He gradually collected a number of discontented or turbulent persons, whom he was able to arm more or less efficiently, and during the first week in July—the exact date has never been published—he headed a raid against the Roman Catholic converts in Central Szechuan, seized M. Fleury, one of the two French priests ministering in the district, and barely failed to capture the other, M. Louis, who escaped in a wounded condition. The French Consul at Chungking, M. Haas, immediately called upon the local authorities to contrive M. Fleury's rescue, and the French Government intimated to the Tsung-li Yamên in Peking that the Governor-General of Szechuan would be held responsible for the unfortunate priest's safety. Troops were accordingly despatched from Chêngtu, early in August, but of course the difficulty was how to exercise force without imperilling M. Fleury's life, for Yü was understood to be holding him as a hostage for his own safety. We have no information about the movements of these troops, but it was generally considered very doubtful whether they could be trusted to act against Yü, as many Kalao Hui associates were supposed to be in their ranks. Yü, though said to be bitterly hostile to Roman Catholicism and its professors, showed a desire to treat directly with the French authorities, but they, of course, would have nothing to say to him. The next incident of the story was the death of the Tartar Governor-General of Szechuan, which took place at Chêngtu during the third week in August, and was said to have been self-inflicted, his mind having given way under the pressure of the difficulties confronting him. He certainly had failed completely to accomplish anything in the way of bringing Yü to justice, and on September 16th news reached Chungking that a disturbance had occurred at Hochou, a town about sixty miles to the north of that place; that the origin of the trouble was a proclamation—doubtless anti-Christian—issued by Yü; and that the American mission had been looted and the Catholic mission burned, happily, however, without any injury to life or limb. Now, we have the intelligence that Yü has captured another French priest, and that his followers have surrounded a town which they are about to attack. Evidently his proceedings have assumed the dimensions of a revolt, and when we consider that nearly three months have elapsed since he seized M. Fleury—who, at the date of latest advices, was said to be incarcerated in a coal mine—the helplessness of the local authorities becomes very striking. Chungking is a very difficult place to reach, and the centre of Szechuan is still more difficult. The two unfortunate priests are in very evil plight, for no pressure brought to bear upon Chinese officialdom in accessible places will invest it with power to stretch out a competent arm to Yung-chang. Of course the time will come when foreign Powers will insist upon taking into their own hands the duty of preserving order in districts which, though opened by treaty, are proved to be beyond the range of the Chinese Government's effective administration.

It is certainly very disquieting intelligence that the Szechuan insurgents have invested or captured—the latter seems to be the right version—Chungking. On September 15th Yü Man-tze and his followers looted the American mission and burned the Catholic mission at Hochou, a town fifty or sixty miles north of Chungking. It was therefore evident that the troops sent against them from Chêngtu in the first week of August had failed to effect anything. Then came news, dated September 29th, at Shanghai, that Yü had just captured another French priest, and that a body of 1,000 soldiers had been ordered to march against him, doubtless from Chêngtu. Apparently he has left these troops behind him and moved rapidly upon Chungking. It will be observed that the intelligence comes from Chêngtu, the principal town of Szechuan, situated some twenty miles to the north-west of Chungking. The natural source of intelligence should be Chungking itself, for we can not suppose that the rapidity of the rebels' movements rendered access to the telegraph impossible. There are several foreigners living in Chungking, and as Yü is avowedly anti-foreign, their fate would cause considerable anxiety but for two reasons: first, that the river supplies a ready road of escape, and secondly that unless Wü's followers have increased extraordinarily in numbers, the rebellion can not be of a really formidable character. Still Chêngtu and Chungking are very difficult of access, and if the local authorities are unable to cope with the disturbance, it may have plenty of time to develop and involve a large region before reinforcements can arrive. We believe that a British gun-boat was ordered, a few days ago, to proceed to Ichang, but it can not have arrived there yet.

ANOTHER PROHIBITED PUBLICATION.

The Official Gazette announces that another foreign publication has been proscribed by the Authorities as injurious to public morals, and that any copies of it found on sale will be confiscated. It is entitled "Sklodanowsky's Leben de Photographicen. Lieben-Lust und Lied."

THE FOREIGN LOAN.

Arithmetic does not seem to be a strong point with some of the journalists who are discussing the methods to be pursued in placing Japan's bonds abroad. They say that it is better to make the rate of interest low even if the bonds have to be sold cheap, and the reason they assign for their contention is that since interest will have to be paid for a great many years, a small difference in the rate will ultimately amount to a very considerable sum. That is really very naïve. No doubt fifty payments of 4 yen aggregate 200 yen, whereas 50 payments of 3½ amount to only 175; and on the other hand, if a four-per-cent. bond sells for 100, a three-and-a-half per cent. bond should sell for 88.5, so that the net gain by adopting the lower rate seems to be 12.5 at the end of fifty years. It is conceivable that the proposition, stated in such terms, might appeal to the intelligence of a school-girl. But surely persons undertaking to discuss finance should be able to understand that the rate of interest is fixed from the first, and that any change which it undergoes in proportion to the price of the bond is a change in name only and not in reality. If London is willing to buy Japanese four-per-cent. bonds at 96, it will not give more than 84 for her three-and-a-half per cents. and a borrower who has to pay 3½ for a debt of 84 yen is in precisely the same position as a borrower who pays 4 for 96 yen. In that particular phase of the interest question the actual cost of the transaction is not involved at all But it is well worth while to consider the influence that Japan's present choice may have on her future credit. As a matter of sentiment it would be well for her to raise herself, if possible, out of the ruck of nations borrowing at 4 or 5 per cent Apart from that, however, she ought to look forward to the time when her bonds, whatever price she gets for them now, will approximate in value to the best securities in the markets of London, Paris, or Berlin. She may reasonably anticipate that time, we think, and when it comes, her financial position will certainly be stronger if her 3½ per cents. are selling at par than it would be if her 4 per cents. were selling at a premium. As to the terms which she is likely to obtain in London, there can be no doubt that if she chose to give tangible security —her customs revenue, for example—she could sell three-and-a-half-per-cent. bonds at par. Possibly some people may advocate that course, nor can we question that it would be the wisest plan, provided —and the proviso is important—provided that the transaction is final. If there is no prospect of another appeal to the foreign money market, the customs revenue might be pledged on the present occasion without inconvenience. But it is difficult to emerge from the system of security when once it has been inaugurated. If Japan gives security now, she will have to pay very heavily for any loan that she attempts to raise hereafter without security, and beyond her customs revenue, we do not see what security she has to offer. Consequently, if she pledges that unique asset now, she may find herself embarrassed by and by. Besides, the national credit alone should be quite good enough to command very tolerable terms.

The sale of bonds in London on account of various productive enterprises will not commence until next year. It would be obviously unwise to go abroad for money until the sums now lying in the Treasury are exhausted. When the proper time comes, the bonds will be offered as sterling bonds, their denominations expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence. According to present intentions, the rate of interest will be low, probably 3½, but the bonds will be sold at a discount, and since they will be redeemed at par by lot, investors will have a chance of reaping a good profit. Thus, the purchaser of a 3½ per cent. bond at 90, redeemable by lot after 4 years, may receive altogether 114 in the 5th year. In other words, his investment may bring a profit of 24, which will be the same as though he had placed his money originally at 6¾ per cent. interest. Such terms ought to prove very attractive to capitalists, and, so far as Japan is concerned, they seem to offer the best chance of getting access to the stores of cheap money awaiting investment in Europe.

THE HAWAIIAN REPRESENTATIVE.

The Official Gazette announces that Mr. R. Irwin, Hawaiian Representative, was received in audience by the Emperor on the 29th ultimo, in connexion with his return to his country, which means, we presume, the closing of the Hawaiian Legation, inasmuch as the annexation of the islands by the United States has dispensed with any further necessity for their separate representation at foreign Courts. It is a pity that the words used by His Majesty on such occasions are not published, for in Mr. Irwin's case they doubtless embodied a warm recognition of the great service rendered by him to Japan. Without Mr. Irwin we question whether Japanese emigration to Hawaii would ever have become an accomplished fact. Certainly the system would never have been organized so cleverly and worked so tactfully as to prove not merely a source of wealth to the country, but also a means of encouraging the spirit of enterprise and furnishing highly profitable employment for thousands of people who would otherwise never have emerged from the hopelessly hard, hand-to-mouth existence of farm labourers in the remote provinces of Japan. The Emperor, who takes such a keen interest in the welfare of his subjects, must be well aware of the great boon that Hawaiian emigration has proved to them, and we do not doubt that His Majesty found in Mr. Irwin's farewell audience a fitting occasion to commend his services.

RELIGIOUS SERVICE FOR SOLDIERS KILLED IN THE WAR.

It is announced in the Official Gazette that a special service for the men who lost their lives in the war with China and in Formosa, whether those killed in battle or those that died of wounds and disease, will be performed in the Yasukuni Shrine at Kudan at thirty minutes past midnight on the 4th November, and that a special great festival will be held on that day and the following. A complete list of the dead is published in the issue of the Gazette which contains the announcement. The list occupies 32 closely printed pages, and contains eleven thousand names.

THE ASHIO COMPLAINANTS.

To any one who has read the regulations enacted and the proclamations issued in the days of the Tokugawa for the control of the peasantry, the collection of taxes, and the enforcement of procedure relating to complaints and petitions, the magnitude of the change that has come over the lower orders in Japan during the Meiji era seems almost incredible. Englishmen, to be sure, have had some not very dissimilar experiences of their own during precisely the same period, for the recognition now extended to the rights of labour contrast startlingly with the treatment received by the trades unions twenty-nine years ago, when a Judge declared from the bench that they might be robbed with impunity, being too illegal to possess any title to the protection of the law. The Japanese rustic seems to have completely forgotten the restraints of old times, and to have lost all sense of awe in the presence of officialdom. Fifty representatives of the farmers in the Ashio-poisoned prefectures found their way to the Department of Agriculture and Commerce on the 30th ultimo, and behaved as if the place belonged to them, and as if they had been accustomed all their lives to enjoy free acess to public buildings. They asked to see the Minister, and, on being recommended to retire, and chose four or five delegates instead of such an unmanageable number as fifty, they vociferously protested that the Minister had promised to admit them, and that they intended to wait until he fulfilled his promise. In vain the attendants, the police, and the gendarmes counselled them to be reasonable. They said they had resolved to brave all hazards and that nothing should drive them away until they had obtained a hearing. They kept their word. Evening came; the officials withdrew, and two or three hall porters alone remained. But the fifty rustics held their ground patiently. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce is the most imposing edifice in Tokyo. It is doubtful whether any one of the fifty peasants have ever seen, or dreamed of, such a huge, massive structure. But it did not awe them one little bit. They roamed nonchalantly about the big building, making themselves thoroughly at home, and spending the night amid magnificence that must have painfully contrasted with the desolation they had left at their own homes. On the following day their patience was rewarded. The Minister gave audience to them and spoke very sympathetically and tactfully. He said that the Government had full cognisance of their condition and was most anxious to assist them in every legitimate way. Some of their requests could be complied with, but others were quite out of the question. For instance, they asked to have their lands restored to the original condition, but that would cost about 13 million yen, and the Government had not 13 millions to spend, nor could obtain it without the Diet's assent to increased taxes. Means were provided for helping persons reduced to a state of a state of destitution, but no machinery existed for restoring lands which had been laid waste. The Minister also dwelt upon the impropriety of attempting to bring thousands of people to Tokyo in order to present petitions direct, without recourse to the duly constituted local authorities. The peasants then withdrew, but they did not leave Tokyo. They merely repaired to a house in Shiba which had been procured for them as an office, and they are there now, Mr. Tanaka Shozo apparently keeping them company.

SPECULATORS AND SWINDLERS.

The opening of the era of mixed residence will doubtless lead to various displays of enterprise on the part of both Japanese and foreigners. In 1885, when there seemed to be a fair prospect that Treaty Revision would soon be accomplished, the general belief among the Japanese was that a great demand for land would spring up, and many people invested in building sites at prices which, even had the expectation been realized, would not have left much margin for profit. Something of the same spirit seems to be now at work, though, on the whole, people appear to be comparatively free from extravagant expectations. The Hochi Shimbun tells a story of a company having its origin in a peculiar circumstance. A certain Mr. Yuyama Yanao, owner of a place called the Baku-yen, or cascade garden, at Sano, near the base of Fuji-yama, sold the land to a foreigner for fifty thousand yen. The transaction is described as a swindle, but we can not discern the grounds of the statement. Having effected the sale, Mr. Yuyama concluded that the foreigner's object in buying was to utilize the water-power of the cascade for manufacturing purposes, and that if he could obtain control of the source of the stream, he might exact a heavy payment from the foreigner. In pursuance of that design, he is now said to be in treaty for the land above the cascade. Further, in conjunction with Mr. Isobe, a barrister of Tokyo, and Mr. Sakamaki, editor of the Akebono Shimbun of Shizuoka, he has formed a company called the Sanri (three advantages) Shōkai, which has for its object the purchase of places celebrated for scenic beauty and their subsequent sale to foreigners.

GOVERNORS OF PREFECTURES.

The latest cause of friction between the two sections of the Constitutional Party is said to be a somewhat extensive change in the personnel of Governors of Prefectures. Fourteen of the present Governors are to be replaced by new men, and an idea is entertained that four of the number are to be Progressists and ten Liberals. There is consequently a considerable outcry, and another most unsightly display of jealousy. It is much to be desired that the Progressists and Liberals should part company. Their union tends only to furnish unedifying spectacles, and, if much longer continued, will result in completely discrediting the system of party government. Before they succeeded in overthrowing the so-called "clan statesmen," the party politicians found nothing more blameworthy in the Government's record than the traces of Jojitsu, or favouritism, which they professed to detect everywhere. Favouritism there may have been. We are not in a position to pronounce any opinion on that point. But certainly it was never exposed to gaze as conspicuously as is the favouritism which these same politicians now seem to regard as fitting and proper.

INCREASED TAXATION.

Some of the vernacular newspapers say that the saké tax is to be increased to 14 yen a koku; in other words, doubled, the present rate being 7 yen. But we have reason to know that the assertion is incorrect. There is no inherent reason why the tax should not be raised to 14 yen or even 20 yen. If the Government were in a position to impose upon alcohol and Chinese samshu duties sufficient to prevent them from coming into competition with the home-brewed liquor, there need be no hesitation in levying 20 yen a koku on refined saké, for it is the beverage of the upper classes, and even though it paid such a tax, it could still be sold for a price comparing favourably with that of cheap wines in Europe. However, there is no intention of exploiting the tax to that extent at present. The rate fixed by the Government is 12 yen, or an increase of 5 yen, and the additional revenue anticipated is 20 millions. Altogether, the revenue to be derived from increased or newly imposed taxes in the 33rd fiscal year of Meiji—1900-1901—will be 30 millions. Count Inouye's programme for obtaining additional revenue included 16 millions, in round numbers, from an increased tax on agricultural lands, and 3¾ millions from increased charges on railways and telegraphs. These two items are ruled out by the present Cabinet, the former for reasons which have already been fully explained; the latter because it is considered unwise to adopt any measure calculated to impair the people's facilities of communication. On the other hand, Count Inouye would have raised the Saké Tax to 10 yen only, thus obtaining an additional revenue of 12½ millions, whereas the present Minister of Finance raises the tax to 12 yen, and gets an income of 20 millions. Hence against Count Inouye's 32½ millions (agricultural lands 16 millions, Saké Tax 12½ millions, and railways and telegraphs 3¾ millions) Count Okuma gets 20 millions from the Saké Tax alone, and obtains other ten millions from the urban building lands, from sugar, and from the income tax.

It is intended, we understand, to spend no less than 32 million yen on the improvement and extension of the telegraph service. The outlay will be spread over three or four years, and the money will be obtained by an issue of bonds. This item, indeed, forms part of the sum to be raised abroad and at home during the next few years. Japan will then possess a fine service of telegraphs. The building of new railways and the improvement of the old are also to be pushed on vigorously, for it is felt that to delay these productive enterprises because the required funds are not actually in hand would be very unwise policy.

According to official calculation, the ordinary revenue will aggregate 180 million yen, approximately, in 1901, and will amply cover the expenditures. The Army and Navy were set down in the post-bellum programme at 50 million yen as the regular yearly expenditure when the scheme of expansion was completed. But owing to the rise of prices and other causes, the expenditures for the two services will be 60 millions.

THE DOSHISHA AFFAIR.

We are not sure whether the wisest course just at present might not be to refrain from all public reference to the Doshisha trouble, since there is a reasonable possibility that a settlement will be effected, and cōoperation restored between the Japanese and foreign friends of the institution. But as we have lent our correspondence columns for the full and free ventilation of the facts of the case, we fall under a species of obligation to refer to one point which we are in a position to elucidate. In the long and interesting letter recently published in this journal over the signature of "Edmund," the following paragraph occurs:—

> Another reported remark also needs correction. Probably no criticism of the action of the Doshisha Trustees has had so much weight as the remark said to have been uttered by Count Okuma on first hearing of the matter. It has gone round the world several times and is no doubt now being repeated somewhere by some impassioned speaker whose zeal is in inverse ratio to his real knowledge. If ever uttered by Count Okuma it was evidently uttered in view of the representations and interpretations made by men who might reasonably be expected to know wherein they spoke, but who, as has been shown, were mistaken. In any case Count Okuma is well known (at least in Tokyo) to hold views of the changes made quite the opposite to those at first said to have been expressed now that he understands the facts from the stand-point of the Trustees.

With regard to this we have made direct inquiries and their result does not confirm "Edmund's" version. Count Okuma did express emphatic disapproval of the Trustees' action when the facts were originally submitted to him, and his view of the reprehensible character of their procedure at the outset has not undergone any modification. But, as His Excellency understands, they have since changed their position, so that it no longer seems to violate the principles upon which the institution was founded, and Count Okuma's opinion of the present state of the Doshisha has, of course, changed correspondingly. His original condemnation stands, however, and its significance can not be minimized.

The arrival of Mr. McIvor has directed public attention once more to the affairs of the Doshisha. Mr. McIvor comes as legal representative of the American Board Mission. His business is to investigate and adjust the Doshisha question, and he is commissioned to act on behalf not only of the A. B. Mission but also of the trustees of the Harris fund, Messrs. Davis, Gordon, Learned, and Curtis being nominated as an advisory committee to consult with him. We understand that full power to determine the method of procedure and the terms of settlement is delegated to Mr. McIvor and the Advisory Committee, though, of course, the wishes of the Board have been definitely stated. It need scarcely be said that the prime desire of the Board is to see the Doshisha restored to what they regard as its original and legitimate condition, namely, a genuinely Christian institution. The detailed steps of such restoration are probably open to discussion, but they would doubtless include the elimination of any Trustees who have shown themselves antagonistic to the fundamental purpose of the institution; the appointment of a President, and the organization of a Board of Trustees, who shall be genuinely representative of Evangelical Christianity; some arrangement, more or less comprehensive, with regard to the religious belief of the teachers, and the furnishing of written guarantees that no departure from the principles thus restored to operation shall be made so long as the institution avails itself of the funds subscribed by Christians for its establishment and support. Failing a settlement on that basis, or some approximately similar basis, the Trustees of the Doshisha will be required to restore the money given to the institution by the A. B. Mission and Mr. Harris, as well as the property in lands and houses now held in the name of the Doshisha but purchased with foreign funds. The money to be restored would amount to $148,000 (gold)—namely, $73,000 given by the A. B. Board and $75,000 by Mr. Harris—and the property includes nine houses in Kyoto, together with the lands on which they stand, together with buildings and sites in various other places. If a settlement can not be effected amicably, recourse will be had to the courts of law, but since the latter step would necessarily involve the abandonment of all hope of restoring the Doshisha to its original status, we sincerely trust that it may be avoided. A similar hope is expressed in the columns of the Mainichi Shimbun, but that journal's method of discussing the question does not commend itself to our sense of justice. It claims that Mr. Nishima's purpose in organizing the Doshisha was, not to propagate Christianity, but to promote education, and that in attributing to him the former intention, foreigners fell into an error. They inferred his object from what they saw and knew of his character and his creed, and their inference was faulty. So long as Mr. Nishima lived, his influence averted any clash of views, but after his death the inevitable collision came. It is a most unfortunate affair, our contemporary goes on to say, and if it is carried into court, the effect upon the minds of Japanese and Americans alike will be most disastrous. The Japanese will conclude that the Americans are narrow-minded and bigoted: the Americans will conclude that the Japanese are insincere and dishonest. Such, in brief, is the Mainichi's argument. It may be re-stated without any perversion of terms but in such a form as to display at once the strange morality it embodies. An eminent Japanese propagandist of Christianity, a man who is devoting his whole life to the spread of the Christian creed, approaches the Committee of an association of Christian propagandists in America, seeking aid to found and endow an educational institution in Japan. He knows perfectly well that the Committee have no manner of right to divert any of the funds placed in their trust to purposes of purely secular education, or to collect any money from the association for such a purpose, and they, knowing that he knows, and believing in his integrity, place a large amount at his disposal. Nay more, they send out Christian propagandists, to organise and give instruction in the institution, and they support them in the discharge of those functions for many years. Then the Japanese suddenly turn round and say:—"You were mistaken. On our side there never was any intention of making this a Christian institution. Our object from the outset was secular education pure and simple. You have given us your money, therefore, under a false impression. But we mean to keep it and spend it in our own way. You should not have been so confiding at the outset." Does the Mainichi really think that such a statement of the case for the Trustees of the Doshisha constitutes an excuse, or palliates their action in any way?

THE YOKOTA AFFAIR.

Our readers are probably very tired of hearing about the Yokota affair. Yet the dénouement is worth telling. We are not quite sure, indeed, that the story is quite correct, for it appears in the columns of the Fiji Shimpo only, whereas the other leading journals of the capital allege that the question is still sub judice. However, the Fiji Shimpo is generally credible, and we can scarcely suppose that, after such a long delay, the Cabinet failed to arrive at some final decision when it held its usual meeting on Tuesday. Both sides, the Fiji says, have suffered defeat. All the Progressist members of the Cabinet—with the exception, naturally, of the Prime Minister, who acted the part of a peace-maker—supported Mr. Ohigashi, the Minister of Justice, and were aided by the Director of the Legislative Bureau, who was present at the meeting, and spoke against Mr. Yokota. But the Liberal members took the other side, and were joined by the Ministers of War and of the Navy, so that the majority were against Mr. Ohigashi. Victory would thus have rested with the Chief Public Procurator had not an entirely new charge been preferred against him. It appears that, a few days ago, he addressed to all the Cabinet Ministers, with the exception of the Minister of Justice, a letter asking to be heard by the Cabinet in his own defence, and using against Mr. Ohigashi language which is held to be quite unbecoming in an official document and with reference to a Minister of the Crown. On the strength of that letter the Cabinet's verdict has been given against him. We presume, therefore, assuming the Fiji's account to be accurate, that both the Minister of Justice and the Procurator will resign. Indeed, our contemporary alleges that Mr. Yokota will be deprived of office as a disciplinary measure. That will be a pity, for he enjoys the reputation of being a jurist of very high qualifications.

THE SEIWA TETSUDO.

A telegram from Osaka says that the Seiwa (Ise-Yamato) Railway Company is to be dissolved. It is not easy to discover the precise causes of this decision. We alluded briefly in a recent issue to the embarrassments which had overtaken the concern. They were then represented in a familiar form, namely, large expenditures and small or invisible results. The specific accusation, however, seems to be that the directors called an extraordinary meeting, and, by some irregular process, obtained permission to sell a number of shares upon which nothing had yet been paid up. Several of the principal Osaka shareholders instituted legal proceedings in the Nara local court against the directors, but there appeared to be chances of adjustment without a judical decision, when suddenly, owing to some complication not made clear by the telegram, a crisis was precipitated, and the dissolution of the Company was resolved at an extraordinary meeting. There have been a considerable number of these unsavoury incidents lately, and their effect upon the oplooking public has been very injurious to Japanese credit. It may be stated, we think, that until the spring of this year a distinct improvement was discernible in Japanese commercial morality as it presents itself to foreign eyes. But within the past few months, very ugly troubles have overtaken various companies and flagrantly dishonest proceedings have been revealed under circumstances where integrity might fairly have been expected. Foreign observers have thus been forced back to their old attitude of distrust. There would be great injustice in forgetting, however, that Japan, since her war with China in 1895, has been passing through an era of speculative mania precisely after the manner of other countries under corresponding conditions. Her mania, indeed, has not been as violent as theirs. She has escaped without a crisis. But the era has added a new word to her vocabulary—Homatsu Kaisha, or bubble company—and the morality of her people has been subjected to a test which it certainly has not supported well, but which, after all, no nation has ever supported well. These things have to be remembered and due allowance made for them. People who believe that there is any inherent lack of moral fibre in the Japanese will be found, one day, to have judged harshly and unwarrantably.

THE MAYOR OF TOKYO.

On the 1st instant, the Tokyo City Assembly came together for the purpose of exercising its newly acquired privilege of electing three citizens from among whom the Minister of State for Home Affairs will nominate the Mayor of Tokyo. It has been already explained in these columns that under the special system of municipal government hitherto operative in Tokyo, Osaka, and Kyoto, but abolished by a vote of the Diet last session, the functions of Mayor used to be discharged by the Governor, who is appointed by the Cabinet. The people now, however, have the right to elect a Mayor of their own choice, and the election is made by the City Assembly, which chooses three candidates and submits their names to the Home Department. The voting resulted thus:—Mr. Matsuda Hideo—a Director of the Bank of Agriculture and Industry—42 votes; Mr. Sado Tokihisa, 38 votes; and Mr. Yoshino Seikei, 33 votes.

TELEPHONES.

A new telephone exchange has just been opened at Shimbashi. The list of subscribers to whom instruments have been furnished, and of employés engaged at the exchanges is given as follows by the vernacular press:—

	Subscribers.	Employés. Men	Women
Central Exchange.....	1 400	21	67
Nadiwa Exchange	1 300	14	54
Shimbashi	1.100	13	39
Totals	3 800	48	168

The night work is done entirely by men. The women come on duty in two shifts, the first from 7 a.m. to noon; the second, from noon to 7 p.m. The men also work in two batches, the first from 7 p.m. to midnight; the second from midnight to 7 a.m. It is said that the busiest time of the day is from 8 to 9 a.m. There is talk of a large increase in the number of machines, and of radical improvements in the plant.

LIEUT.-GENERAL VISCOUNT TORIO.

The public has not heard much during the past two years of Viscount Torio, who shares with Count Soyeshima, the honour of leading the little band of Japanese politicians that call themselves Conservatives. The once celebrated officer seems to have gradually passed out of the vista of general observation since he penned the remarkable essay which showed such an unerring perception of the egoism of Western civilization. He seems likely, however, to occupy a prominent place once more in the eyes of the public, for he has suddenly stepped into the political arena under a very peculiar flag. It may easily be conjectured that the Viscount sees many objectionable features in the present administration. Party Government is to him a detestable innovation, quite opposed to the principles upon which Japan has been ruled for twenty-five centuries; and to aggravate matters, party government, as exemplified at present in Japan, means the conduct of public affairs, not by statesmen whom the Sovereign has nominated, but by a species of Jacobin Club. Whatever be the strength of the stout old General's convictions, however, he has no political following to give effect to them, and in his dilemma he has had recourse to the Buddhist priesthood of whose cause he has been such a resolute advocate all his life. A letter addressed by him to the incumbents of the great Hongwan temple and to the sect they represent, urges that the present political crisis calls for the active interference of all sincere Buddhists, and exhorts the priests to preach a crusade against the introduction of a system manifestly at variance with the time-honoured polity of Japan. A Tokyo contemporary says that a copy of this letter has come into the hands of the Cabinet Ministers, and that they regard it as a document not fitted to emanate from a man in Viscount Torio's position, namely, a member of the Privy Council.

THE REPRIEVE OF CHANG.

A telegram from Peking is published by the Tokyo Asahi, to the effect that Marquis Ito, on receiving news that Chang Yin-yuen had been condemned to death, proceeded at once, though the time was midnight, to the residence of Li Hung-chang, and induced him to employ all his influence for the reprieve of Chang. We doubt greatly whether that story is correct. That Marquis Ito did everything in his power to assist Chang may be taken for granted, but according to our information the midnight visit to Li Hung-chang was made by Mr. Hayashi, Japanese Charge d'Affaires in Peking. Li is very inimical to Chang, but was nevertheless induced by his visitor's earnest representations, to employ his good offices on behalf of the condemned official. What offence Chang had committed we have no idea, but the plot in which he was supposed to have been implicated had no existence. But in China to be in the way, under certain circumstances, constitutes a capital crime on the part of a high official. The regents appointed by the father of the present Emperor's predecessor were beheaded because they had been appointed regents when there were worthier candidates in the field.

JAPAN AS A MANUFACTURING COUNTRY.

In a speech delivered a few days ago by the former Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, Mr. Kaneko Kentaro, to the members of the Oriental Association (Tohokyokai), he insisted strongly on the expediency of adopting every possible means to promote industrial enterprise in this country. The history of the world shows, he said, that nations fall into three categories with respect to wealth. The poorest are those which, like India and Australia, export chiefly farm produce and raw materials. Next in the scale come countries which, like Germany, France, and America, work up their own products and export them in the manufactured state. And at the head of all stand countries which, like England, import raw materials from abroad and manufacture them. Japan has a fair prospect of attaining the second rank. She is beginning to produce at home fabrics hitherto imported, and to export in manufactured form materials hitherto exported raw. But a period of stagnation has overtaken her. It is well illustrated by the figures relating to the export of silk:—

Year.	Total production of silk in catties.	Total export of silk in catties.
1892	6,850,000	5,400,000
1893	7,700,000	3,700,000
1894	8,180,000	5,480,000
1895	10,000,000	5,810,000
1896	9,000,000	3,910,000

A similar falling off is recorded in the case of textile fabrics, rugs, porcelain, and so forth, while, on the other hand, the imports from abroad have steadily increased in bulk. Mr. Kaneko repudiates any adherence to the old-fashioned doctrines of Adam Smith. He is not at all perturbed about "the balance of trade." But statistics have a lesson to tell, and wise people will not hesitate to learn it. Of course the causes of the present "set back" are not far to seek. There is, first, the great appreciation of prices that has taken place, since the war, in the market for raw materials and for labour; there is also the depressing effect produced by the bursting of a number of bubble companies—the outcome of conditions always arising after a victorious struggle with a foreign country—and in this category must also be placed the high rate of interest that has ruled. These are incidental factors of disturbance. Then follows the fundamentally disabling factor that the Japanese have been for centuries accustomed to carrying on all industries on a petty scale, as domestic industries in short, and that they have not yet developed the faculty for organizing their work so as to be able to meet a large demand and to turn out great quantities of goods uniform in quality and character. In the third place, there is the fact that almost all the country's available capital has been fixed and none remains floating. In the fourth, the difficulty presents itself that the goods manufactured depend upon their technical, artistic, or experimental features rather than upon their economical usefulness. Finally, the people are not familiar with the conditions existing abroad, and are therefore unable to adapt their work to foreign tastes and requirements. Such a state of affairs suggests considerable uneasiness on the verge of the era of mixed residence. What is to be the route leading to renewed vigour of development? Is it to be cheap foreign capital in Japanese hands alone? Or is it to be foreign capital with recourse to the co-operation of foreign expert knowledge and experience? Or is it to be foreign capital in foreign hands solely, the Japanese furnishing labour only? Mr. Kaneko dismisses the third plan with contempt and pins his faith on the second.

COTTON SPINNING IN SHANGHAI.

The strike of the cotton-spinning operatives in Shanghai draws attention to a fact of which little public notice has been taken, namely, that the cotton-spinning industry in Shanghai is not realizing any of the hopes entertained at the outset of the enterprise. On the contrary, it threatens to find a place in the catalogue of the Settlement's disasters. We speak only from hearsay, having no direct knowledge of the facts, but there seems to be no reason to doubt the correctness of our information. The first difficulty is connected with the supply of raw cotton. It appears that the Chinese local authorities have resorted to their familiar device of exorbitant taxation, so that the price of the cotton when it reaches the mills is not consistent with profitable operations. That is an incident which we predicted from the very first. If it had not occurred soon, it would have occurred late. Still, there would always remain the resource of using imported cotton. Japan does not find in her immediate neighbour, China, as favourable a source of cotton supply as she finds in comparatively distant India. The story of her imports from each country during the past five years is instructive:—

IMPORTS OF RAW COTTON.

	From China.	From British India.
1893	7 805.999 yen.	6 052 047 yen.
1894	8,120 417 „	7,846.580 „
1895	13 786 101 „	7 693.224 „
1896	8 158 084 „	19 244 840 „
1897	9 527 818 „	25,720 188 „

Hence, even if the Shanghai mills were deprived of the advantage of supplies of cotton grown virtually at their own doors, they ought still to have been able to prosper with cheap labour and with an immediately available market. But cheap labour is exactly the factor which seems to have proved defective. The Chinese will not work for a low wage in the mills. They have demanded a ruinous rate of remuneration, and we strongly suspect that the strike now reported is due to an attempt on the part of employers to reduce the cost of labour to a reasonable figure. It has also been found, we learn, that female hands are unserviceable in China, the small footed women being unable to move about with sufficient ease. It is disheartening to think that the employment of foreign capital and the exercise of foreign enterprise should have encountered this check in Shanghai.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Six Major-Generals have been promoted to the rank of Lieut.-General. They are Baron Oshima, Baron Oseko, Prince Sadanaru (Fushimi), Baron Tachimi, Major-General Tamura, and Major-General Terauchi. Baron Oshima is to command the 9th Division; Prince Sadanaru, the 14th; Baron Tachimi, the 8th; and Lieut.-General Tamura, the 12th. Colonels Ando, Iida, and Arai have been raised to the rank of Major-General.

THE TREASURY'S PURCHASES OF BONDS.

It would seem that virtually the whole of the public loan bonds "floating" in the market six months ago have been bought up by the Treasury. The quantity offered daily for purchase by the Bank of Japan does not now exceed four thousand yen. On the other hand, the total purchases hitherto made aggregate about 35 million yen, whereas the former Minister of Finance hoped that 20 millions would satisfy the demand. It would have been possible, of course, to set limits to the transaction, but the Government rightly judged that any semblance of a disposition on the Treasury's part to stop the purchases might be misinterpreted by the people, and would probably lead to a marked decline in the market price of the bonds. As a measure of financial policy, the buying of the bonds must be pronounced a distinct success. The tightness in the money market has been relieved, and the bonds have appreciated considerably. Last year, many people argued that the Government lay under an imperative obligation either to raise a loan abroad for the purpose of redeeming the whole of the War Bonds, or to apply the remaining portion of the Indemnity to that object. Their reasoning took the line that, in subscribing to the War Bonds at the time of their issue, capitalists were actuated not by economical motives but by patriotic, and that they fully relied on the Government to find means of reimbursing them should such a step become advisable in the interests of trade and commerce. The step had become distinctly advisable, these critics said, and therefore the Government should not hesitate any longer. But the result of the transactions carried on by the Bank of Japan since June goes to prove that the bond-holders were not actuated by any desire of redemption on a wholesale scale. Thirty-five million yen has satisfied them.

A NEW VERSION.

Shanghai is doing itself justice. The occasion deserves to be utilized, and the manufactory of "bunders" shows no symptoms of being worn out. The Emperor having been poisoned and having committed suicide, the only remaining method of disposing of him without an anti-climax was to represent him as having disappeared. That story, accordingly, has now been circulated, with all the accuracy of detail which the public have a right to expect at this late hour. His Majesty, the telegraph says, conceived a scheme of abolishing the Empress-Dowager. We are not told what form the abolition was to take: that is left to the imagination. The duty of carrying out the programme was entrusted to Yuen Shi-kai. Yuen, however, took the Viceroy Yung into his confidence, and Yung lost no time in informing the Empress-Dowager. Her Majesty thereupon invited the Emperor to visit her at the Summer Palace on the 22nd ultimo, and the Emperor, understanding that his plot had been discovered, disappeared and has not since been heard of. There is only one thing to be said about these various tales, namely, that they all agree in representing the Emperor as a "vanished quantity."

LARCENY OF MAIL MATTER.

One of the troubles that disturbs the regularity of postal communication in Japan probably escapes the notice of many critics, not because its influence is insignificant, but because it has no precedent in other countries and is therefore not suspected of existing here. We allude to thefts of mail matter. Of course letters containing money or other valuables run a risk of being purloined in every land and under any system. But that is not the kind of thing to which we now refer. What we mean is petty larceny; the pettiest conceivable, in fact: larceny so petty that it would not seem worth the attention of the light-fingered faculty in Europe or America. The quarry at which the thief aims is a newspaper or the stamp on a letter, and his method of procedure is to go a-fishing with a wire hook in the pillar posts. Generally the newspaper is desired, because it is easier to convert into money than a postage stamp is. But the newspaper-lifter has also a tendency to interrupt the continuity of a correspondence, for his hook may come up freighted with a letter as often as with a newspaper, and it would not pay to restore the letter to the box, because the mutilated state of the envelope would betray the fact that the mail had been tampered with. The profit to be reaped by that kind of theft is so very insignificant that it could not constitute a practical temptation unless the value of money were extraordinarily great, as is the case in Japan. When a coin whose sterling equivalent is less than half a farthing has important rank in every-day accounts, a stamp or a newspaper worth four times that amount becomes well worth stealing.

SEVERIN.

Severin has emerged from prison. He managed to attract a great deal of attention during his incarceration, and he has at least the consolation of knowing that his experience will prove useful to foreigners in general, since it has helped to demonstrate the impossibility of feeding them on Japanese diet. After Severin's resources were exhausted, he had to fall back on the rice-and-barley meals constituting the ordinary prison fare, and the effect upon his health was so bad that the authorities were obliged to supply him with bread and meat as medical necessities. One of our Yokohama contemporaries, it may be noted, preferred a charge of inhumanity against the governors of the prison on the ground that, despite Severin's sufferings, they would not allow any departure from ordinary Japanese fare. It was an unjust accusation. The regulations did not create any competence to vary the fare according to the nationality of the prisoner, but the doctors solved the difficulty by ordering a change to bread and meat as medical necessities. Probably some sensation-lover will now get hold of Severin and publish a moving tale of his woes, which the public will duly credit, though they would refuse to believe the man's oath about anything else. Already, a new handle for criticism has been furnished by the Fiji Shimpo, which says that Severin was originally sentenced to ten months' imprisonment with hard labour, commencing from October 21st, 1897; that he appealed from the sentence; that the Tokyo Court of Appeal reversed the finding of the lower tribunal, but sentenced him to the same term of imprisonment on another count; that the Appeal Court's decision was not pronounced until 5th instant, and that, as the new sentence counted from the day of his incarceration, he was immediately released. That is obviously an incorrect account. We know that Severin went to Sugamo prison and was there put to hard labour, which would not have been the case had his appeal been sub judice. We know, also, that he was brought back from the convicts' prison at Sugamo to the House of Detention at Kajibashi to be tried on a new charge. Probably what happened was that, the Local Court having found him guilty on a new count, he again appealed and was successful on the second occasion.

MR. FUKUZAWA.

Our readers will learn with regret that Mr. Fukuzawa's malady does not yield to treatment as rapidly as was hoped. The distinguished patient is still in a semi-conscious condition, and has not recovered the power of speech. It is stated that the Government is desirous of conferring a title on him, but his often-declared objection to such distinctions stands in the way. There is uncertainty as to whether he would accept even a first-class order, and unfortunately he is not in a condition to be consulted.

Whenever an official of rank or the possessor of a title or a high-class order is seriously ill, the Emperor of Japan seldom fails to send a message of inquiry. It takes the form of a brief letter from the Minister of the Household Department, expressing the Sovereign's condolences and announcing some gift of wine, confectionery, or what not. Mr. Fukuzawa is said to be the first private individual who, without either title, office, or order, has been honoured by the receipt of such a message.

The hopeful accounts current on Wednesday about Mr. Fukuzawa's condition are not confirmed by subsequent bulletins. Thursday morning's medical report represented him as still in a semi-comatose condition, and not even capable of being fully roused to take nourishment. A good deal of anxiety begins to be felt about the result.

MISS TSUDA.

Miss Ume Tsuda and Mrs. Ogashina—or Miss Watanabe as she has been called since she left Japan—, who went to America a few months ago to attend the general meeting of the Women's Clubs, were invited by His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and other prominent people in England to be present at the Oxford convocation, which took place in the closing days of last month. The ladies were most successful in the United States, and will doubtless repeat the experience in England.

THE CHINESE LEGATION IN TOKYO.

Interviewed by a representative of the Tokyo Asahi, Mr. Li, the new Chinese Chargé d'Affaires, said that the recently appointed Minister to the Court of Japan, who was prevented by illness from taking up his appointment and is now lying sick in Shanghai, will probably recover soon and proceed to Peking, where he will be commended to another post. The Chargé d'Affaires is accompanied by three officials who are under instructions to investigate and report on the system of university education in Japan. They will probably devote two months to the inquiry.

THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF JOURNALISTS.

The International Association of Journalists of Japan met at the Hotel Metropole, Tokyo, on Sunday afternoon, being the first meeting since the formal formation of the Association, and the opportunity to form acquaintances and to exchange ideas was taken advantage of by a satisfactorily large number of members. After the routine business of the meeting had been disposed of, the following Resolution was framed and unanimously adopted:—

"That whereas, by the death of Mr. Henry Tennant, the International Association of Journalists of Japan has sustained a severe loss, he being not only a factor in bringing about the formation of this Association with a view to promote a fraternal spirit among native and foreign journalists, but untiring in his efforts—which there is every reason to hope are to be crowned with success—to remove the obnoxious and illogical legal obstructions in the way of the publication of newspapers in Japan by foreigners. Now therefore be it

"Resolved that a letter be sent by this Association to the family of the late Mr. H. Tennant expressive of our heartfelt regret at his untimely death and of the great respect we entertained for him.

At the termination of the meeting the members adjourned to a private dining room, where an excellent dinner awaited them. Those present included: Messrs. Yamagata, Tokyo Independent; Yamagata, Yorodzu Choho; Takayama, Taiyo, Mochizuki, Japan English Journal of Commerce; Sakuma, Sekai-no-Nihon; Katayama, Labour World; A. B. Brown, Japan Mail; Sato, Nippon; Isobe, Chugai Eiji Shimbun; Takenobu, Japan Times; F. Schroeder, Eastern World; Captain Brinkley, Japan Mail; Uyeshima, Hochi; Oka, Chuwo; Nagasawa, Asahi (Tokyo); Taguchi, Keisai; Ikebe, Asahi (Tokyo); Matsumoto, Greater Japan; E. Norman, Japan Gazette; Muramatsu; G. A. Adam, Japan Advertiser; R Hay, Japan Gazette; K. Takahashi, Japan Times; Tsuchiya, Jiji Shimpo.

REINFORCEMENT OF THE BRITISH SQUADRON.

It has been known in Hongkong for some time, says the China Mail, that the Admiralty had been advised to reinforce the British squadron with a newer type of gunboat suitable for work on the rivers and inland waters of China. We now learn that four new gunboats will shortly be sent out to Hongkong. These vessels will be sent out in pieces as freight on cargo steamers, and will be fitted up in the dockyard of the Hongkong and Whampoa Dock Company. The names of the gunboats are as follow:—Woodlark, Woodcock, Sandpiper, and Snipe. One boat will make her headquarters at Shanghai and the other at Canton, while the remaining two will be retained in the fleet reserve at Hongkong ready for any emergency.

This will be a useful addition to the British squadron, and will be especially welcomed by the isolated foreign communities along the Chinese waterways, who are subjected to periodic scares owing to the action of the anti-foreign Chinese. Before long there may be plenty of work for these little gunboats.

DEATH OF THE HON. T. F. BAYARD.

The news of the death of the Hon. Thomas Francis Bayard will be received with general regret. Mr. Bayard was an American of the best type, while remaining still a thorough American, in patriotism and feeling; and he was as popular in London as in his own country. Born at Wilmington, Delaware, in 1828, he at first entered mercantile life, but abandoned it for law, and thence, by an easy transition, passed into the field of politics. In 1885 he entered President Cleveland's first Cabinet as Secretary of State, and, after a retirement into private life, he was appointed in March, 1893, as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James. He was the first Ambassador appointed by the United States, his predecessors having the simple rank of Envoys Extraordinary. Mr. Bayard had some difficult questions to deal with, and at the time of the Venezuela dispute and President Cleveland's bellicose Message his position was a delicate one. It is probably largely owing to his tact; his English sympathies, and his personal charm of manner that official relations between the two countries are at present so satisfactory.

SAMPAN AND JINRIKISHA FARES.

At a meeting of the Foreign Consuls at Yokohama recently, Dr. Ritter, the Swiss Consul General, as Doyen of the Consular body, was instructed to convey to the Governor of Kanagawa Kencho representations concerning the frequent disputes between foreigners and coolies, and the occasional attacks on the former. These quarrels mainly arise from the coolies demanding more than their legal fare from passengers in sampans or Jinrikisha; and to remedy such an unsatisfactory state of things the Consuls recommend that large notices be put up at the Hatobas and the Railway station stating the legal fares for jinrikisha and sampans to different parts of the town and harbour, and also the proper charges for hire by the hour or day. They also recommend that jinrikisha coolies shall be numbered and registered and each shall carry a tariff in English to be produced on the passenger's demand. No reply has yet been received from the Governor.

BASEBALL.

YOKOHAMA V. MIKAYO CLUB, TOKYO.

The return match between these Clubs on Saturday afternoon afforded a capital and most interesting game. The Japanese team was much stronger than that which opposed Yokohama a fortnight ago, and the issue was for a long time doubtful. The game appeared at first altogether in favour of the Japanese, who at the end of the sixth innings had 11 runs against three gained by the Europeans. Onderdonk, who had been pitching for Yokohama, was then superseded by Blake, who was so successful with the ball that the Tokyo team only scored one run off him. In the eighth innings a magnificent hit by Onderdonk enabled him to make a home run, and gave Morse, on the second base, the chance to get home as well. This was the turning point in the game, which ended in a win for Yokohama by 13 to 12.

NEW BISHOP OF OSAKA.

The Hiogo News reports that the choice of a Bishop for the See of Osaka, in succession to Bishop Awdry has fallen upon the Rev. H. J. Foss, who has been labouring in Kobe for the last twenty years. It is superfluous for us to add, says our contemporary, that the reverend gentleman is held in the highest esteem by all with whom he has come in contact. During his long identification with the work of the Church of England in Kobe the Bishop-designate has won a very large circle of friends who will rejoice to learn of his elevation.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

It need scarcely be said that recent events in China have occupied a large part of Tokyo journalistic attention during the past week. Four years ago, most of us would have been inclined to question the profundity of Japan's knowledge of China. But one of the lessons taught by the war was that she had studied her neighbour carefully and astutely, and that she understood a great deal better than Western nations did how little real substance was behind the shadow of China's bulk. A good deal of interest and importance consequently attach to the views of the leading Tokyo newspapers at this juncture, for they can no longer be suspected of speaking without knowledge. The principal impression produced by their writing is surprise at their optimism. With scarcely any exception they take the view that the reforms in China have not been stopped but only suspended. Even the news just received that all the sinecures have been re-established, does not appear to shake this faith. The Mainichi Shimbun, for example, says that if once the spirit of progress has descended upon a nation, nothing can drive it out. For a moment it may lose its active vigour, but its influence will assuredly reassert itself. Japan's case illustrates that fact. The men who overthrew the Shogunate were openly pledged to an anti-foreign policy, but no sooner had they attained their political object than they were constrained to yield to the sentiment of the time and throw open the country. It will be so in China also. The nation has put its hand to the plough of reform, and can not turn back even if it would, for a power greater than selfish prejudice or political interest beckons it onward. Other journals discuss the matter from a narrower but more practical stand-point. The Chuo Shimbun may be quoted as their representative. It says that a careful scrutiny reduces the dimensions of the complication in Peking to comparatively small dimensions. The issue at stake was not progress or stagnation, not the nation's persistence in the path of reform or its reversion to old-time conservation, but simply whether the Canton party or the Manchu party should have the ascendancy. The Manchus have won, but the effects of their victory are confined to the north: they do not touch the south, which is the great centre of reforming influence; they do not paralyse Chang Chih-tung, who must be regarded as the head of the progressive movement, after the Emperor. These journals are strongly of the opinion that the Yangtsze valley is the real back-bone of China, the seat of her moral and material vitality; and they think that, whatever may happen at Peking, the movement which began last year along the Yangtsze and has grown steadily ever since will continue until the whole nation obeys it. At the same time, they acknowledge frankly that should their hopes prove baseless, should it be found that conservatism has really become once more the order of the time, China's condition is desperate, and her independence can not be preserved.

There has been a great deal of writing also, virtually unanimous writing, about the increased importance which these events impart to an understanding between Japan and England. At first the papers spoke with bated breath about the possibility that Russia had taken some covert part in the plot for the restoration of the Empress Dowager. But subsequently they used much plainer language, and we have them now openly declaring that the matter concerns England and Russia and Japan and Russia, and that the triumph of the Empress-Dowager's party is so much gain for Russia and so much loss for England and Japan. They agree in urging the Government to adopt a bold course, but none indicates what that course should be. In the latter respect their utterances are most unsatisfactory. The Yomiuri Shimbun, for example, contrasts England's resolute procedure in regard to Kang Yu-wei with Japan's action, and, having recalled the fact that all the persons arrested in Peking are members of the Anglo-Japanese party, insists that Japan should emulate British energy and British courage. But when we expect to be told what the desired step is, how the energy and the courage are to be emulated, we are put off with the vague platitude that, as a matter of course, no intimidation must be resorted to, and that nothing is needed except to "keep the cause of progress alive." Only that forsooth! The Mainichi is less indefinite. It wants everybody who is interested in Chinese progress to cross over to the Middle Kingdom, and endeavour to play there the part of a Parkes, a Verbeck, or a Harris.

At no time since the organization of the Constitutional Party have its elements seemed in such danger of flying apart as at present. A host of minor associations have been formed within its ranks, and though some profess to be animated by a desire to increase the cohesion of the party, the majority appear to be simply discontented agitators. A few days ago, these sections held a meeting at a restaurant in Tokyo, and our readers will be able to form some idea of the motley character of the gathering when we say that those attending represented the Dō-shi Club, the Kwanto Club, the Jōhoku-kai, the Hokushin-hasshu-kai the Hokuriku Club, the Kaga Club, the Nihonbashi Club, the Chugoku Club, the Kinki Club, the Yehime Club, Hyogo-ken Dantai and the Kiushiu-kai. They mustered over sixty strong, all members of the House of Representatives, and, on the motion of the Dōshi Club's delegates, they proceeded to pass two sweeping resolutions:—first, that the Administration must be completely remodelled; and secondly, that all the clan elements must be eliminated. These proposals led, at first, to some discussion, and were not finally endorsed until the second day. It does not appear, however, that the delay was caused by any objection to the proposals themselves. The method to be adopted for giving effect to them was the stumbling block, some being of opinion that the best plan would be to make representations to the Cabinet, whereas others held that experience having proved the uselessness of appealing to men so incompetent as the present Ministers, no plan was open except to agitate for the total reconstruction of the Cabinet. It was finally resolved that a committee should be elected for the purpose of deciding upon the steps to be taken.

Referring to these events, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun concludes that the foundations of the Cabinet are in a perilous condition. Marquis Ito handed over the Administration to Counts Okuma and Itagaki because they declared their ability to carry it on, and because he was naturally averse to continuing the conflict between the Cabinet and the political parties, with its disquieting effects upon the national mind. But it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the two Counts do not possess the competence attributed to them. They have failed above all things to accomplish anything in the field of finance. The greater part of their time and attention seems to be occupied in arranging disputes between the parties ranged under their banners. They virtually take their instructions from the General Committee of the Constitutional Party, which meets once or twice a week to formulate its views and to give directions to the Ministry. Even the appointment and retirement of high-class officials are determined by the Committee. In short, the name "Government" can no longer be given to the Cabinet. The Kokumin Shimbun writes in the same strain but uses much stronger language. It declares that the Cabinet is a mere bureau of political parties and that the Ministers of the Crown are the servants of party leaders. Everything is determined by the General Committee of the Constitutional Party. Chokunin officials, who ought to be nominated by the Cabinet in conclave, are chosen by the Committee. Even a Cabinet meeting can not be held without the Committee's sanction. The Ministers themselves hold office at the beck of the Party. Such a state of affairs has never existed in any country except on the eve of a national disaster. It need scarcely be stated that the Nichi Nichi and the Kokumin are opponents of the present Cabinet.

The incident of the Ashio sufferers' arrival in Tokyo has provoked some discussion. About fifty delegates, representing the large body of petitioners who set out originally from the four prefectures affected by the poison, reached Tokyo on the 30th ultimo and proceeded to the Department of Agriculture and Commerce. They failed to obtain audience of the Minister on the first day, and the fact furnished an opportunity to the Yomiuri Shimbun, which of late has been conspicuous for attacks upon Count Itagaki. The Yomiuri said that Mr. Oishi would have met the farmers and listened to their complaints had not Count Itagaki interfered, on the ground that the men had failed to comply with the proper rules of procedure. Is not the present Cabinet pledged, the Yomiuri asked, to abolish all red tape, and dispense with the ceremonies and circumlocutions which have hitherto hampered private individuals in their attempts to discharge business with officials. Had not these poor folk already exhausted every conventional method of obtaining redress? Had they not sought relief by every normal channel? They are not rioters. They are distressed rustics, who, seeing themselves on the verge of ruin, if not actually ruined, by agents which ought to be officially controlled, were compelled, as a last resource, to make the long journey to Tokyo on foot, and lay their prayer at the feet of the Authorities. All the principles of humanity entitle such persons to a sympathetic hearing, and it ill became Count Itagaki to interfere. This criticism is strongly and effectually traversed by the Tokyo Shimbun. It asks whether any valid excuse can be offered for the invasion of Tokyo by ten thousand men, carrying such rude weapons as they could find, and organized for the plain purpose of intimidation. It is the Government's duty not to countenance such proceedings. A moment's consideration of the consequences their frequent repetition would entail suffices to indicate the danger of encouraging them. This brief discussion would scarcely be worth noting but for the evidence it furnishes of dissension in the camp of the Constitutionalists. The Yomiuri Shimbun, which has always been regarded as an organ of the Progressists, and which is closely connected with an official occupying a high post in the Educational Department, has of late availed itself of several opportunities to attack Count Itagaki, the head of the Liberals. That sort of thing is plainly incompatible with any hope of the two parties' permanent coalition.

The crusade against Baron Iwasaki continues. His opponents have now been joined by the Chuo Shimbun, which appears to have vehement reasons for its animosity. It has commenced a series of articles under the title of Ogon no Ma-o, or "the evil monarch of gold," and it frankly announces its resolve to persevere in its assault until the Baron ceases to preside over the Bank of Japan. Such incidents are common in the life of all prominent men. Baron Iwasaki is not likely to be greatly disturbed by them. His disposition will be rather to join the laugh raised by the Sekai-no-Nippon's cartoon, where he is represented playing a flute with all the Cabinet Ministers dancing to his music.

The Nippon has an article which might be useful to the Manchu politicians of China could it come under their notice. It points out that one of the chief sources of danger to the integrity of China is internal dissensions, since they furnish opportunities for foreign interference. China is no longer a closed country, nor can her politics be kept independent of alien influences. Such incidents as those that recently occurred in Peking create valid excuses for outsiders to step in and gain a foothold from which it will, by-and-by, be vain to attempt their displacement.

PRESENTATION TO WOR. BRO. KEIL.

A very notable gathering of Free Masons was held in the Masonic Temple, Yokohama, on Wednesday evening, the occasion being the presentation to Wor. Bro. O. Keil, District Grand Secretary of the District Grand Lodge of Japan, and Grand Master of the Consistory of Japan, 33°, of his portrait painted in oils by Mr. Fred. Yates, the well-known artist, and subscribed for by Masons resident throughout Japan. Despite the inclement weather there was a good attendance, several members of the craft coming down specially from Tokyo. Shortly after 9 o'clock, Wor. Bro. Gowey, Consul-General for the United States at Kanagawa, rose and briefly introduced Wor. Bro. Stuart Eldridge, M D., who was to make the presentation on behalf of the subscribers.

Wor. Bro. ELDRIDGE, on rising to address the assembly, said:—There are certain virtues which should, and generally do, distinguish Masons as such, and which, in the broad sense, include all the best of which our nature is capable; but the practice of which is modified by the temperament and moral development of the individual. Occasionally arise in our fraternity men whose lives afford a transcendent example of these noble traits of character—(hear, hear)—and we are fortunate enough to include such an one in our own number. I need scarcely, in this gathering of his friends, say that I allude to our dear brother Keil.—(Applause). With faith that good lies hid in all mankind, with hope that this leaven of righteousness will, sooner or later, be manifest in the worst of men, and with an all-embracing charity that finds fruition both in sentiment and practice, our brother has quietly pursued his way through life, cheering, blessing, and helping all with whom he has come in contact.—(Applause.) Though his broad charity has not been limited by the lines of our organization, we, as Masons, owe him a special gratitude. It is to him that we are indebted for ready, kindly, and skilled assistance in every Masonic emergency, to him that we repair in trouble, certain of sympathy and help, and it is to him that we owe even the beautiful and appropriate temple in which we are now assembled. The desire to offer to Brother Keil some evidence of our appreciation and affection has long been present among us, but we were unable to determine the form of such tribute. Masonic rank we could not give, for Brother Keil has already reached the highest honours; while the presentation of jewels or plate seemed too commonplace to express the peculiar intensity of our feeling. While the matter was being mooted the arrival in Yokohama of a portrait painter of eminence, Mr. Frederick Yates, seemed to afford an exceptional opportunity to carry out the wishes of Brother Keil's Masonic brethren, and, by a limited number of his more intimate friends among them, his portrait was ordered. The understanding was that while, for many reasons, it seemed preferable, and the higher honour to Brother Keil, that the testimonial should be the gift of the Masonic fraternity of Japan, as a whole, should any opposition or lukewarmness be encountered, the givers of the commission for the picture would themselves assume the responsibility. As was to have been expected, no antagonism, or even indifference, was met with in the canvass that ensued, but the idea was taken up with such enthusiasm that twice the fund needed could easily have been obtained. From Yokohama, Tokyo, Kobe and Nagasaki subscriptions poured in, and even non-Masons expressed themselves ■ anxious to be allowed to contribute. Touched by the kindly magnetism that surrounds Brother Keil, the artist made his work a labour of love, and of the result you are now able to judge.—(The curtain that hung over the portrait was here drawn aside amid applause.)—Rarely, I think, does the most skilled painter catch the subtle suggestion of the inner man so perfectly as in the present case, and the portrait now before you will, I trust, transmit to future generations of Masons some idea of the tenderness, kindliness, and goodness of its subject. And now, dear brother, loved friend, and loving companion, permit me, in behalf and in the name of the whole Masonic brotherhood in Japan, to present to you this superb likeness of yourself as a slight evidence of the affection and esteem with which we regard you, together with the roll of those who have honoured themselves in contributing to its production. May the Great Ruler of the Universe long spare you to us.—(Loud and continued applause.)

Wor. Bro. KEIL, on rising to accept the gift, was received with loud applause, long continued. He said:—Brother Eldridge and brethren, when this portrait was first conjectured, when the first hint was given that such a presentation should be made to me, I racked my brain to discover the cause for such an unexpected, such an unprecedented honour, and I still think that I am entirely unworthy of it.—(No, no.) Brother Eldridge in his laudatory remarks failed to enlighten me as to what I had done to deserve this from your hands, for I cannot accept for myself the terms he used. True, I have always taken a keen interest in the Order, in its working, in all its social gatherings, and in its charities. But has not every one of you done the same? I would rather accept your gift as an expression of your individual friendship for me: for are we not all banded together on one platform to stand hand to hand, foot to foot, shoulder to shoulder, in support of and to maintain the glorious principles of the Order—faith, hope, and charity. In that sense, then, I will cherish your generous gift until the last hour of my life. Once more, brethren, I thank you for it.—(Loud applause.)

The portrait has been described in a previous issue of the Japan Mail. It is a splendid likeness and worthy of the brush of the distinguished artist who painted it. Hanging over the Senior Warden's chair, it makes an ornament to the Masonic Temple of which the craft in Japan may justly be proud.

After the presentation, the Brethren adjourned to the banquet room, where Bro. Dr. Eldridge proposed the health of Wor. Bro. Keil. The toast was drunk with enthusiasm. Wor. Bro. Keil, in response, gave the toast of the painter, Mr. Yates, who, in reply, said that the credit for the success of the portrait lay more with the sitter than the artist. He found that the hardest workers made the best sitters, and Mr. Keil, as they all knew, was a busy man. Wor. Bro. Keil next gave "The Craft," and the assembly then resolved itself into a social gathering, gradually dispersing as the hours drew on.

VALUE OF GOLD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In the National Review, February, 1895, Mr. T. E. Powell, the Editor of the Statist, writes:—"Law then controls the value of gold and law controls the value of silver; that being so, it quite clear that the law can control, if it chooses, the relative value of the two." This can only mean that, in the writer's opinion, the value of gold in gold using countries is fixed by law.

Commenting on the above, the Manchester Guardian, 13 Feb., 1895, expresses full approval of Mr. Powell's article and endorses his opinion, viz., that the value of gold is fixed by law. One of the Chief Trades Union leaders, Mr. Rawlinson, of Burnley, in addressing the Blackburn Trades Council, said:—"Now while it is quite true that the mint price of gold is the same as it was in 1873, it is no less true that the value of gold may have risen as compared with commodities." However strange, almost unaccountable indeed though it be, I believe that there are many people who would treat as absurd not the statement that the mint price does fix the value of gold but the plain, obvious, and self-evident fact that it does not.

It is a curious phase of intellectual aberration that a piece of metal is coined and at once becomes worth so much by the fiat of the law.

The gold sovereign is not a standard of value at all in the sense that a yard is a standard of measure or a pound of weight.

The only thing in existence towards which the gold coin is a standard is the bank note, but its purchasing power or value depends entirely on supply and demand

Your Obedient Servant,

GOLD STANDARD.

THE DOSHISHA: A REPLY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

DEAR SIR,—For some days after reading the communication by "Edmund" I felt wholly disinclined to reply to it. A communication charging, under the cover of a nom de plume, men, whose character stands before the community untarnished, with misrepresenting facts, with cherishing "personal prejudices, antipathies, jealousy and bitterness," is pretty well outside the realm of controversy. No member of the American Board's Mission to Japan has written anything on this subject under a fictitious name. If "Edmund" felt constrained to charge them with un-Christian and un-gentlemanly conduct, was he not in honour bound to give his own name?

Fortunately the veil behind which "Edmund" endeavours to hide his identity is hardly of material substantial enough for the purpose. We can recognize behind it a gentleman whose present connection with the Dōshisha and former connection with the Mission do hardly entitle him to the claim of being an "unbiassed observer." Moreover the case, as is well known, is nearing a final settlement in some form. The wearisome period of newspaper-discussion is pretty well over. A detailed reply to "Edmund" is therefore, not necessary, even if I should feel inclined to undertake it But the communication has been translated into Japanese and is being circulated freely by some if the trustees and by their friends. It will, therefore, not be out of place to restate briefly the facts in the case.

The constitution of the Dōshisha states that articles containing the fundamental principles of the school are unchangeable. Other articles might be amended; these six articles were declared by the constitution itself to be unchangeable. Moreover the trustees on assuming office give an oath* to labour for the interests of the company "in obedience to its fundamental principles." On the strength of this constitution the trustees have received in trust for definite purposes large amounts of money from donors in the United States. Without conference with these donors the trustees have changed these articles of the constitution which they had sworn to maintain unchangeable; for to swear to labour in obedience to unchangeable articles certainly must mean to maintain them as they are. No gain accruing from a change, no necessity, be it never so dire, can justify the change of even an iota of a constitution which is accepted as unchangeable and which they have sworn to maintain so.

The fact that the Imperial Edict is not antagonistic to Christianity has absolutely nothing to do with the matter. Hodge's "Systematic Theology," or Fairchild's "Moral Philosophy," or Ian Maclaren's "Creed of Life" are certainly not antagonistic to Christianity; but the trustees would have had no right to give the promise to anyone that the moral education of any part of the school should hereafter be based on any of these. A trust is a sacred obligation; no tampering whatever is justifiable.

The trustees felt so bound by their sense of obligation under the late Mr. Harris' letter of gift that they could not consent to a change desired later on by the donor himself, but the very rock-bed foundation on which they hold all their trusts they feel free to change without a word of conference with the principal donors.

I would not be understood, Sir, as treating this matter sarcastically; too much is at stake to allow this. But I would have the real facts stand out in the clearest possible light, so that all the world may judge whether we missionaries have been fighting merely for a theological shibboleth, as we have been accused of doing, or whether fundamental moral principles are at stake.

* The Japanese term used is sensei, which Brinkley's Dictionary explains as "An oath or affidavit;" sensei suru: "to make an oath."

In conclusion allow me, Sir, to state in the briefest form two more facts:

The issue lies not between the missionaries of the American Board in Japan and the trustees of the Dōshisha, but between this latter body and the American Board itself. Nor is it the case that only we missionaries have opposed the action of the trustees; the great mass of Japanese Christians, of every denomination, regardless of theological opinion, have no less plainly expressed their condemnation. Theological prejudices have nothing to do with the matter.

And again, it is not the case that we missionaries have opened a warfare upon the trustees without having ascertained the significance of the changes made. One of our number, one who has been among the most active in discussing this action of the trustees in the public press, immediately upon hearing of the decision wrote to three of the trustees, but received a reply from only one. But more than this, for five years previous to this decision of the trustees, all the missionary members of the faculty, seeing the drift of the course pursued by the president, by the trustees, and by a majority of the Japanese faculty, pleaded and remonstrated at every possible opportunity, but without avail. I think we can claim that we did all that was open to us to do. That we have been faultless none of us will claim; but to an Christian conduct we feel no occasion to confess.

Allow me to express to you, dear Sir, my sincere thanks for the generous courtesy which you have all along extended to us in granting to us so freely the use of your columns, and believe me to be

Yours most respectfully,

GEO. E. ALBRECHT.

THE W.C.T.U. CONVENTION.

[COMMUNICATED.]

The third annual Convention of the Foreign Auxiliary W. C. T. U. opened in Union Church, Tsukiji, on Wednesday, Sept. 28th, the anniversary of the late Miss Frances E. Willard, whose death was noticed some months ago. This being the first public Convention held by this body, the meeting possessed special interest, and was well attended. The President, Miss Mary Florence Denton, called the meeting to order, and led in the opening devotional exercises. After the business of the morning, Mrs. Fisher gave a Bible reading, her subject being Prayer. The points emphasised were:—the need of prayer; for whom we should pray, and the command given to pray for our neighbour. At the close, Mrs. Fisher was requested to place her manuscript in the hands of the Society for publication. Miss Clara Parrish led in a memorial service for Miss Frances E. Willard and Miss Maud E. Simons, in which many took part by reading selections from published testimonials, and personal reminiscences.

The annual report of the work, read in the afternoon, showed 18 departments of work adopted, 15 of which reported progress. The Treasurer's report showed 161 members enrolled, including 36 received during the year; cash received from dues, yen 118; toward the Florence Crittenden Home, yen 406.

The Rev. Dr. Soper, representing the Central Temperance Committee; the Hon. Taro Ando, the Tokyo Temperance Society; Miss Gundry, the King's Daughters' Society; Mr. Niwa, the Y.M.C.A.; Mr. Ninomiya, the Yokohama Temperance Society; and Mrs. Bailey, the Salvation Army, conveyed the greetings of their various societies. A solo by Mrs. Garst, and an address by Miss M. A. Veazey, delegate to the World's Convention of 1897, closed the session. The grand rally in the Y.M.C.A. Auditorium in the evening was an unqualified success, there being an audience of fully 700 present. The Hon. Sho Nemoto presided. Addresses were given by the Rev. Dr. Soper, Rev. K. Miyama, the Hon. Taro Ando, and others, with special music by a double quartette. The prayer service held in Ginza M. E. Church, on the morning of the 29th, for the success of the plebiscite being taken in Canada that day, was well attended notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. The afternoon was occupied in the transaction of business, the Florence Crittenden Home being one of the chief matters discussed. The basis for coöperative work was adopted, and some necessary details arranged, with a view to the early opening of this work. By an almost unanimous vote of the Convention the relation of the Foreign Auxiliary to the National W. C. T. U. was settled. The Foreign Auxiliary becomes by this action auxiliary to the National Society. The annual fee for members is one yen, and whereas in the past the auxiliary has paid out of this fee an annual due of two cents per member into the treasury of the World's W. C. T. U., henceforth a yearly due of ten sen will be paid, and from this amount the dues for the World's treasury will be forwarded by the National Treasurer. By this change the Foreign Auxiliary becomes entitled to delegates in the National Convention, and members are eligible for election to any office in the National Society. This change was felt necessary in the interests of the general work and to effect a closer union. Fitting resolutions of thanks were passed to friends who havend kily entertained members of the Convention; to representatives of other Societies for kindly greetings; to Japanese friends for their presence; to the Trustees of the Union Church who kindly placed the building at the Auxiliary's disposal; to the president of the National Society for lending the World's banner; and to all who in any way contributed to the successful carrying out of the plans for this Convention. A resolution to memorialize the various Railway authorities to provide a non-smoking carriage in every train was also unanimously passed, as was also the following, by standing vote:—"Whereas Miss Clara Parrish, the World's Representative, is about to leave us, Resolved that we desire to record our hearty appreciation of the efficient service she has rendered in advancing the cause of temperance generally, and that of the White Ribbon cause especially; also of her dauntless spirit in the face of difficulties, her unwavering faith in the final triumph of the cause she represents, and her happy tact and bright enthusiasm in association with all. We lovingly commend her to those among whom she will next labour, wishing her 'God-Speed' as she goes on 'Around the World.'" It was also resolved to extend to Mrs. Large, as the successor of Miss Parrish, hearty co-operation in the work, trusting that by united efforts, the cause may progress until the right prevails. The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows:—President, Miss M. F. Denton; Vice-President, Mrs. C. Davidson; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. E. S. Large; Recording Secretary, Miss M. A. Veazey; Treasurer, Mrs. A. C. Borden; Superintendents of Departments—Evangelistic, Miss Belle Allen; Social Purity, Miss Anna Kidder; Schools and Colleges, Miss S. A. Searle; Sunday School Work, Miss E. P. Milliken; Loyal Temperance Legion, Miss A. E. Otto; Scientific Temperance Instruction, Miss Alice Miller; Narcotics, Miss Louise Imhof; Unfermented Wine, Miss E. A Preston; Sabbath Observance, Miss J. N. Crosby; Health and Physical Culture, Dr. Adaline Kelsey; Food Reform, Miss H. Frances Parmeelee; Dress Reform, Mrs. Topping; Press Work, Mrs. Davidson; Railways and Postmen, Miss E. R. Gillett; Work among Foreigners, Mrs. Van Petten; Petitions and Treaties, Miss Daughaday; Literature, Mrs. Large; and Organization, Miss R. J. Watson.

A fire broke out on Wednesday night about 6.40 at a house occupied by a man named Masajiro, Hirano cho, Fukagawa, Tokyo. A strong wind prevailed, and the flames spread rapidly, destroying many houses.

AN OCEAN DUEL.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL" BY JOHN C. WERNER.)

We were sea otter hunting off the island of Iterup. Success had rewarded our efforts, and at the end of June we had already 73 splendid skins, dried and bundled up, to testify to the skill of our hunters. We had so far only been six weeks on the ground, and had almost the whole season still before us. This was during the early years of otter-hunting, and otters were plentiful, but they were rapidly getting educated, and lately we had had occasionally to do some tall chasing before we had them in our boats, and now and then one was irretrievably lost even after hours of hunting. Our schooner was small—one of the smallest that left San Francisco those days—and we had to economise with men, both in regard to room for them and the supply of provisions. So instead of the shooter having his place at the bow of the boat he was placed in the stern, where he had to sit as steersman when not chasing an otter—and in my opinion he was doing just as well. The boat was pulled by two men with sculls, and the poor otter had a slim chance to escape in a stern chase when the three boats were after him. But unfortunately it was not always a stern chase.

Before we left San Francisco I had the picking of the men, as I went as a kind of dry-nurse for the captain, who was neither a navigator nor a sailor but a dry-goods clerk, and, I must allow, a splendid shot. I was the only one on board who had been up before, and I had it all my own way before we left. The second hunter was a young fellow named Frank Fearon, a good shot, as I knew, having been shipmate with him, and a well educated man besides. The third hunter, George, was also a shipmate of mine, and but indifferent in his shooting, but still not a duffer. The crew were sailors and good men, and expected to make a pocket full of money—which they did not after all. The cook was a Chinaman, and a real cordon bleu, and was the only one on monthly pay. I was the shipkeeper and stayed on board the schooner. The captain had been admonished by the owner, a baker, to stand on his dignity as captain, and this the poor fool did, after he had been posted a little, and, of course, it led to troubles. On the passage across I made them drill with the boats and when we arrived on the ground they were doing pretty well, but there was really no scientific hunting as yet. When it began the the captain, as head-hunter, took the reins in his own hands, and listened but very little to any advice I gave him—he knew all about it.

When otters first began to come on board everybody took interest in the cutting open and skinning of them, and the subsequent staking out and cleaning. Even the captain did so, but for the last few weeks his interest flagged, although he still watched the operation and gave me suggestions, all of which I took in good part. He himself, however, did not deign to put his hand to a knife or a scraper until the skin was off the frame. If he only had kept his mouth shut probably nobody would have said anything about it, but as captain he had to order the men about, and to this they demurred, and high words were frequent. Out in the boats, it seemed, it was the same; more domineering than was needed. George submitted laughingly, but Frank rebelled. There had lately been several disputes about the disposal of the otters after they were killed; the captain often claiming them as his "kill," and having them pulled into his boat when perhaps one of the other hunters had really fired the shot that settled the animal. This sort of thing seems trivial enough, but it has occasioned more troubles on the hunting-ground than more important things. Bringing the otter alongside the vessel meant that the otter was killed from the boat that brought him, and testified to the skill of the hunter of that boat, although it did not bring an extra dollar to his share. There were also complaints that the captain would not use his paddle to assist the men in pulling the boat, when returning to the schooner, but would sit lazily with the paddle in the water, imagining himself steering, which he was not. The other boats had many times to wait for his boat to come up, in obedience to his signal, and this was especially aggravating when they were perhaps 8 or 10 miles from the schooner late in the afternoon. At least two otters had been lost through his dilatoriness that way, and no wonder that the boys were exasperated. All this was reported to me afterwards, and although I advised patience I was really wild about it, and knew there would be an explosion before long.

One day, in early June, as we were anchored close in shore with the schooner, the boats returned earlier than usual without bringing anything with them, but as we had about a dozen skins on frames drying about the deck I felt rather relieved just then at not receiving any addition to them. The captain of course took no hand in securing the boats, but, having taken his rifle below, reappeared on deck and looked around for a comfortable seat. The frames occupied every available spot; so, picking the nearest one up, he pushed it out of his way to a place where the fur and not the skin would have the full benefit of the sun's rays. I watched him with gathering rage, for this was touching me in a tender spot; I was doing my best to dry the skins in order to get them off the frames, and this idiot was ignoring me and my work.

I asked him with, I confess, rather unnecessary force, what he was doing.

He looked up at me with some astonishment—this was the first real sample he had had of my tongue—and said, "Don't you damn me, Sir!"

"Put that frame back again, and go below out of our way," was my answer, and I shook my fist at him, threatening. He looked at me again, then quietly took the frame and placed it gingerly where it had been before, and then obediently disappeared below. I expected to see him again with his rifle; he had been taking it too quietly altogether; but nothing happened. The men gathered aft as if they were going to witness a row, and wanted a share in it, and I had to tell them to go on and scrape the skins before they realized that all was over. Frank whispered that I had put my foot in it.

Things went on after this from bad to worse. Every time the boats returned there were murmurings among the men, and I was at my wits' end to know what to do. Frank Fearon, young fool as he was, was stubborn and would not give in, and so we were in a tangle. The climax came at last. One evening, about ten days after my few words with the captain, George told me the captain had deliberately pointed his rifle at Frank and threatened to shoot him. This was too much! I did not care a fig if the two did shoot one another; but I was there for otters, and at this rate otters were coming in slowly, and the season would be gone before we had enough. I did not say anything that night to either of them, but quietly told the man who pulled the after sculls in the captain's boat to stay on board the schooner the next day, and I would take his place in the boat.

At daylight the following morning the boats were lowered as usual; the captain was always the last, but he finally got over the side, and, while he busied himself in preparing a soft seat, I jumped in and shoved the boat well off from the schooner, and then picked up the sculls and started to pull. The other boats took their places, one on each side of our boat, but keeping nigh and watching developments. I had stuck a revolver in my hip pocket, not of course with any intention of having to use it, but it was not in my way, and a friend in need is a friend indeed. The skipper perceived me directly he turned round to sit down; I was so near that he could put his hand on me, in fact. I could not help smiling at his evident embarrassment; he did not know what to say at first.

"Who told you to come in the boat?" was his first query.

"Nobody told me, Sir!" I replied meekly.

"Well, I order you back to the schooner, 'pull right back,' do you hear me?" and he worked valiantly with the paddle to turn the boat round. But as we pulled against him with the sculls, he worked in vain.

He saw at last that it was no use to struggle; I had no intention of turning back; so he folded his arms across his breast in an imposing attitude and looked at me fixedly.

"Perhaps you will let me know what you are going to do?" he asked after a pause.

"Certainly," said I, obligingly; I did not feel the least excited, "I am going to pull this boat to-day and perhaps to morrow."

"And if I object to it, what then?"

"Now, look here," said I, tired of sparring, "I understand you have threatened to shoot; if any shooting is going to be done I wish to have a hand in it!"

"You!" with a disdainful grin on his lips, "you can't hit a haystack!"

"I can hit you from where I am sitting now, that's sure!" said I, and I tapped my hip pocket, "but keep your hair on, nobody is going to hurt you."

We had in the meantime been pulling hard off shore, and before long there rose an otter, and that finished our talk. After an hour's chase Frank killed him fairly, and he was pulled into Frank's boat without any objection from the captain. For a couple of hours we pulled leisurely along, but nothing more was said between us, and then another otter was sighted; this one was killed within 10 minutes, and it was doubtful whether the captain or George shot him, as they both fired together. The captain was eager to get up before George's boat and get the otter, but I took it easy with the sculls, and when we got there George had the animal already in his boat. The captain fumed considerably, but I laughed at him and asked him what difference it made who had the otter, to which he replied that it looked as if I were going to take full charge.

"I am going to know the reason why we can't get otters now as well as before, and don't you forget it," was my rejoinder.

He sulked silently after that. One more otter we shot before we turned the boats towards the schooner; it was then past four o'clock in the afternoon and the vessel was six miles and more from us.

"Pull hard, boys," said I, as we separated after the last otter was killed, "and let us get on board and have the otters cleaned before dark. "Right you are, boss!" was the answer from all.

I saw the captain was going to adopt his old tactics, as the other boats shot away ahead of us. Presently he held up his paddle.

"What is that for?" was my inquiry, "do you see an otter?" "No, but I don't want them to get too far ahead of us" was his answer.

The boats had stopped and waited for us.

"You use your paddle" said I "and they will not get ahead of us; pull away, you fellows, and don't wait for us, we will get on board before dark anyhow."

And off they were again, pulling and paddling as hard as they could. I swore softly to myself at the idiot who had charge, but just touched the water with the sculls and so did the other man. The boat barely moved through the water. The captain stood it for a while, and then said, beseechingly. "For God's sake, pull away, and let us get on board," and with that put his weight on the paddle, and we, nothing loath, pulled with a will, and were soon close behind the other boats.

Next morning I asked the captain if I should go in the boat; but he begged me to stay on board and attend to the skins.

"Mind," said I warningly, when he went over the side, "no more humbugging after this; you do your best as well as the rest, and there will be no more troubles!"

Everything went well for some time, but I saw that Frank and the captain were still at loggerheads and working against each other, but as long as they brought otters on board I did not say anything unpleasant to either of them. We had been lying at anchor in Worth's Bay for several days doing nothing; in the forenoon of this particular day the boats had been pulling along shore, the boys landed and managed to stave a hole in the bottom of a boat. In the afternoon we had the boat on deck and found a whole plank splintered. One of the men, who was handy with tools, took out the broken plank and employed himself shaping another one. The other two boats were in the water and secured on each side of the quarters. We had no skins on the frames and the men were loitering about the deck, watching the carpenter. Frank and the captain were sitting aft, overhauling their rifles, and engaged in their usual bickering, calling each other names. I was lying in my bunk in the cabin reading, and paying no attention to what was going on deck. I was so used to the daily quarrels that it sounded to me like the buzz of flies. Suddenly I heard a rush overhead, and then somebody sang out, "Come up, the old man and Frank are off to kill one another."

I was on deck like a flash, but too late! They were off, sure enough; one in each boat, and pulling the sculls vigorously off shore. The sea was still rough, and the captain was lagging behind somewhat with his boat, for he was not a good oarsman. I shouted to them to come back, but I knew well enough that I might save my voice. There was no way to reach them and prevent them from their murderous intent; that they were going to settle their quarrel for good I could see; the third boat was out of the question, and I cursed the fools in impotent rage.

"Could none of you prevent them from going?" I asked the men standing alongside me. No, nobody had noticed it particularly.

They were soon a long distance from the schooner; far enough for their purpose, I presumed, as I saw them lay in their sculls and pick up the rifles and face each other. They were about fifty yards apart, but they were both good shots, and the distance was nothing. The boats wobbled about a good deal in the sea, and the captain was rather unsteady on his legs, but Frank stood firm as a rock. I did not doubt the result, and mentally prayed for something untoward to happen to end the fight before it began. Puff, from Frank's rifle, and almost at the same time off went the captain's. Thank God! nobody hurt yet! Puff, this time the captain led, but Frank quickly responded. Still nobody hurt, and I drew a long sigh of relief; they might not have many cartridges with them and then perforce the fight would have to cease. The next shot from Frank settled it; the captain had his rifle up to fire, when we saw him drop it; then sink down on the seat—he stood in the middle of the boat—and then drop backwards into the boat with his legs still over the thwart. The other man stood for a minute with his rifle up, but, seeing no further move from his opponent, lowered it slowly, still watching him. Good God! one man probably killed and another a murderer!

"Good riddance!" exclaimed one of the men. I turned round on him savagely. "I will make good riddance of you, you hound, before we get back!" I cried, and I dealt him a stinging blow across his mouth, and the rest of them looked on approvingly.

Suddenly I saw Frank grasp his rifle again, but this time point it seaward, and fire. Could the man be brutal enough to fire at an otter after what he had done? He did it, nevertheless, and killed him too, as we saw him pull out and pick up the otter, and then pull towards the schooner, without taking any more notice of the other boat and its occupant! Such conduct was inhuman, and I could not understand it. At last he came alongside, and leisurely passed his rifle on board.

"Is he killed?" I inquired in a low voice.

"Killed be hanged," was the answer," he is only playing possum!"

I jumped into the stern sheets and grabbed the paddle, and two good men took the sculls, and we made that boat fairly fly through the water. An extra man was also with us to pull the other boat back. In a few minutes we were alongside, and there lay our Captin, not dead but breathing stertorously. I looked him all over, but found no wound on him, and came to the conclusion that the man had fainted or had a fit through fright, and how thankful I was I need not say. We brought him on board before he came to himself again, and he seemed to be subdued or ashamed beyond my most ardent wishes. Thenceforth he was a changed man.

I asked Frank why he did not pull over to the other boat to ascertain if the man was dead or not, and his answer was, that he could not very well be dead, as he had not fired at him at all, but shot well clear of him every time. The captain had probably done his best to kill Frank, but that I only surmise, as I never asked him about it. By common consent the episode was dropped; and we did fairly well afterwards, and returned to San Francisco the "high liner" of the fleet. The captain returned to measuring out tape and ribbons, as he probably considered that otter-hunting was not his forte, and I have no doubt that he did better in such congenial work than he figured in sea life. I think he has never forgotten his duel on the ocean, though when he tells it to his friends, as he sometimes does, it is a different yarn from mine.

THE PEKING USURPATION.

The Shanghai papers to hand by the French mail throw little light on the probable whereabouts of the Emperor Kuang Hsü, though all are inclined to believe that the unfortunate monarch was made away with as soon as the Edict reappointing the Empress-Dowager to office had been signed. The N.-C. Daily News prints a curious theory which it says is discussed by Chinese in Shanghai. It is that the Emperor managed "to get away from Peking with Kang Yu-wei, and went down to Hongkong in the Ballaarat, the idea being that the services of the Bonaventure would never have been given to convoy the Ballaarat, if she had only had an unimportant person like Kang Yu wei on board." But, as our contemporary urges, in the first place Kang is not an unimportant person, and in the second place even a coolie who has taken shelter under the British flag is not to be forcibly taken away from under it. It would have been of no use to remonstrate and exact compensation if Kang Yu-wei had once been captured. The Taotai made that perfectly clear.

It appears that Kang Yu-wei at first took passage at Tangku by the Hitachi, but on the advice of some Cantonese friends transferred himself to the British steamer Chungking. When the Customs officials and detectives boarded the Chungking at Woosung they found the bird already flown, and this was the story the compradore of the vessel had to tell:—"When our steamer was nearing Woosung a steam launch came alongside and two foreigners got on board. One of the foreigners had a photograph in his hand, and a search of the passengers was made by them. Suddenly one of the passengers was found to answer to the description of the photo, and the foreigner asked him whether it was his? The passenger nodded, whereupon the foreigner immediately took hold of the passenger by the sleeves and led him into the foreign passenger saloon, where a secret conference was held for a few minutes, and the passenger, accompanied by a fellow passenger in his company, went over the ship's side with the two foreigners, taking with them only personal baggage. The launch in question was then seen to go alongside a man-of-war laying some 200 yards distant from the Chungking, and the whole party was observed to board the man-of-war."

The N.-C. Daily News has been assured that Sir Claude MacDonald was in no way responsible for the dismissal of Li Hung chang; that the act was entirely off the Emperor's own bat, and that the Sovereign also warned Kang Yu-wei to flee from Peking. It is stated that the Shanghai Taotai had determined to put Kang away by the slicing process had he caught him.

By the 30th of September the local mandarins acknowledged—according to a statement appearing in the N.-C. Daily News,—that the four-funnelled torpedo-catcher Feiying was sent to Shanghai from Wei-wei-hai by Viceroy Jung Lu to chase the Chungking and if possible get the person of Kang Yu-wei from that steamer. It is further stated that the Chefoo Taotai was also secretly notified by telegraph to capture Kang, but the Taotai was urgently wanted at Kiao-chou at the time, and he carried the telegram with him, not daring to let it be known lest warning be given to Kang of his danger. Hence, when Kang came to Chefoo and actually landed to call upon some of his friends there, buying, en passant, a small basket of variegated coloured pebbles for keeping hyacinth bulbs, and some fruit, not a single yamên runner knew what a big prize had been in his very clutches, until the Taotai returned a day or two afterwards.

A Peking telegram reached our contemporary on Sept. 30th that "the Emperor committed suicide on the 22nd ult." This telegram was transmitted to Japan along with others for whose palpable manufacture Shanghai has been blamed. The N.-C. Daily News, in the course of one leading article, says:—"Our own belief though we may be wrong, is that he is only being kept alive officially until the Dowager Empress thinks she is firm in the saddle, when a sympathetic decree will be issued announcing that H.M. Kuang Hsu has been borne aloft on a dragon to be a guest on high. If he is alive and well, why do not the Foreign Ministers send in an undeniable request for an audience?"

A mandarin who arrived in Shanghai from Peking about the end of September stated that the Emperor had been confined inside the Palace and denied intercourse with everybody since the 21st ult. There is a practice amongst the Manchus, in order to prevent assassination, to provide several doubles of the Emperor, —says a contemporary—and it is possible that the so called "joint audiences" mentioned in some of the telegrams were given by the Empress Dowager and one of these doubles, a fraud which those around the Throne just now would hardly dare, even if they wished it, to expose to the world.

We gather from the N.-C. Daily News that when the Shanghai Taotai heard that Kang-Yu-wei was coming down from Taku he determined to send steam launches filled with runners to Woosung to meet the Chungking and make a search of the passengers there. But this could not be done owing to H. B. M. Consul-General's refusal to sign a search warrant.

According to a telegram in the Shanghai Mercury, Kang Yu-wei, on arriving in Hongkong, was interviewed and stated that he fled from Peking by the Emperor's orders, owing to the Emperor having discovered the plot to dethrone him and kill off all the reformers. He requested prompt British help for the Emperor and the Chinese Empire.

A private Chinese despatch from Peking, dated September 25th, gives, the N.-C. Daily News thinks, the explanation for the recent usurpation of power by the Empress-Dowager. The letter runs:—

It is confidently asserted that one of the last memorials by Kang Yü-wei to the Emperor was an earnest warning to his Majesty to be on his guard against his enemies. Kang strongly urged the advisability of removing the Empress-Dowager to some other Palace where she could not interfere with the reform measures of his Majesty. Another suggestion was that Li Hung chang should be deported to his native city and placed under surveillance. For if allowed longer to go about at pleasure within the palace precincts, his close intimacy with the Empress-Dowager and underhand treachery would one day put a stop entirely to the new régime, and all this hard labour would be lost for ever, by the formation of a powerful league against the Emperor. In this connection Kang denounced a number of the most bigoted of the Imperial Clansmen, who he thought were anxious to make away with his Majesty in some way or other. Although this memorial was kept strictly secret by the Emperor it somehow leaked out and so forced the Empress-Dowager and her party's hand, and she was compelled to assert herself at once. Under advice of the senior members of the Imperial Clan she deposed his Majesty, ordering the instant arrest of the author of the secret memorial for high treason, and of all who had "unduly influenced the ex-Emperor." Had the Empress-Dowager's hand not been forced in this way, the decline of his Majesty's power would doubtless have been much more gradual.

KOREAN JOTTINGS.

The Sŏul Independent urges Japanese and Chinese emigrants to turn their faces towards Korea, and supports its argument by some curious, not to say funny, admissions. It declares:—

Korea is a thinly inhabited country. Its natural resources are capable of supporting a population twice as numerous as at present. The climate is charming. A Japanese or Chinese settler finds moreover, in the peninsula what he could find, neither in Canada nor in the United States, nor in Hawaii nor in Australia, nor anywhere else, viz., a people who not only dare not look on him with contempt as an inferior but whom he could lord it over. Elsewhere he replaces the native labour by his cheapness. In Korea he commands higher wages. Other governments may frame exclusion bills or lay prohibitive taxes on his person or property, but in Korea he finds the government absolutely too weak to protect even its own people from his insults and encroachments. Elsewhere a Japanese or Chinese coolie is nothing but a coolie. In Korea he is a great over-bearing somebody with extraterritorial and other extraordinary rights which the poor Koreans must respect with actual fear and trembling. Elsewhere the governments may violate treaties against him, but in Korea he may violate treaties. The Article IV. in the Chinese treaty explicitly forbids any Chinese from owning establishments where he may expose and sell merchandize in the interior. But in Songdo, Kongjo, Yeisan, etc., Chinese and Japanese merchants do own shops where merchandize of all sorts are exposed and sold. In Yeisan alone, according to the report of a Japanese traveller, there are fifty Chinese houses.

A characteristic note appears in the Independent regarding the Poisoning Affair:—

"It is rumoured that instruments of torture have been freely used in extorting so-called confessions from the prisoners arrested in connection with the late Coffee Conspiracy. If true we feel ashamed that the barbarous custom should still obtain in the police and law courts. Even truth, if told under an excruciating torture, loses its weight in the opinion of the fair-minded. We only hope that the rumour has no foundation in fact."

Thirty-four members of the Korean Privy Council recently memorialized the Throne, advising the Emperor to restore the "five modes of punishment" in dealing with traitors. His Majesty refused to sanction such a step, but meanwhile the Independence Club called a meeting and denounced the memorial in no measured terms. As usual their wrath found expression in another lurid memorial to the Sovereign.

Kong Hongsik, the man who is supposed to have been a principal actor in the coffee poisoning conspiracy, and who has been confined in a cell in the Supreme Court, Sŏul, tried to commit suicide on the 26th ult. It is said that he stuck a knife into his throat and then into his stomach, but that the stabs did not prove fatal.

Further proceedings in the Leopold case took place on Tuesday, one of the accused's sureties having petitioned for permission to withdraw from his bond. The sitting was kept a profound secret, but we have reason to believe that another bondsman was found.

AFFAIRS AT MANILA.

SERIOUS OUTBREAK OF DYSENTERY.

The Hongkong Daily Press of the 27th ult. says:—The City of Rio de Janeiro, which came from Manila and called at Hongkong en route for San Francisco, left yesterday. She is taking home some 350 men afflicted with dysentery. Of these, however, about a dozen were able to get ashore while the vessel was in Hongkong. Two died on the way from Manila, and there is not much hope for four or five others. It appears that the health of the troops at Manila is not so good as it has been, some 1,400 men being down with dysentery. The strange thing about it is that more regulars are affected than volunteers.

We understand that the Pasig, which had been re-named the Abby, has been seized in Batangas Harbour by Admiral Dewey, who had received word that she was carrying arms to the insurgents. The arms had, however, been landed when the seizure was made.

ATTEMPT TO POISON AGUINALDO.

A Hongkong telegram to the Shanghai Mercury dated the 25th ult., says:—On the 16th inst. an attempt was made to take Aguinaldo's life. Three Spanish prisoners who were given great liberty, poisoned the soup that was prepared for the table of the Insurgent Chief. The conduct of these three men aroused the suspicion of the steward, who tasted the soup and immediately fell down lifeless. There was great rejoicing among the Malayos on the fortunate escape of Aguinaldo.

THE COUNT OF TURIN.

The Count of Turin, nephew of King Humbert of Italy, arrived from America by the Coptic on Wednesday, and, with his suite, was accommodated at the Grand Hotel. The Prince has been greatly lionised in America—in the first place because he is a Prince (a quite sufficient reason with stern Republicans), and in the second because of his duel with Prince Henri d'Orleans. He left for Tokyo on Thursday and is staying at the Hama Palace as a guest of the Emperor.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Nagasaki Press says that a naturalised American named Flanigan has been arrested at Chemulpo in connection with the murder of Mr. Lake.

A Washington despatch dated the 1st inst. informs the Foreign Department that Mr. Hay, late U.S. Minister to Great Britain, has been appointed Secretary of State.

The 4.30 express from Yokohama ran into some children who had strolled on to the line near the glass-works at Shinagawa on Sunday afternoon. Several lost their lives.

The British sailing ship F. V. Troop (Capt. Beveridge), which left Hongkong on the 9th August bound to Liverpool, put into Singapore on the 16th ult., after having been ashore on the north end of Banka Island. She is understood to be uninjured, however.

A reply has been received to the telegram forwarded from Hongkong Chinese yarn merchants to the Bombay Mill Owners' Association, to the effect that the question of curtailing production would be considered provided the China and Japan mills co-operate.

It is stated that the Formosan Government has decided to raise loan bonds amounting to yen 30,000,000, and to construct the railway and Keelung harbour. Mr. Goto, the Director of the Bureau for Civil Affairs, will leave Keelung for Tokyo to consult the Imperial Government.

In view of the increasing demand for Japanese silver yen at Hongkong, the Yokohama Specie Bank has sent down large quantities by recent steamers. In Shanghai the demand for silver has also increased, and to-day the Specie Bank will export thither no less than yen 1,200,000.

The comparatively low birthrate among native Americans is beginning to cause them some concern, as it does the French. In order merely to prevent the diminution of a people, that is to say, their decadence as a nation, the average family should consist of four persons. As it is, the American population seems to be increasing rather by the more prolific European immigrants than otherwise, and the matter calls for scientific investigation

The Kobe Chronicle quotes the Osaka Asahi to the effect that the import duty on wines is by the Conventional Tariff with France fixed at 10 per cent., and consequently when the sake' tax is increased, foreign wines will be comparatively cheaper. Therefore, argues the Asahi, the Government will be under the necessity of negotiating with the French Government in order to withdraw wines from the Conventional Tariff. The paper forgets, however, that treaty agreements cannot be so readily varied.

At the commencement of the year the French Government offered to grant an annual subsidy of $80,000 (£16,000) for a direct service of mail steamers between France and Canada, on condition that the Dominion Parliament voted a similar amount. The proposed service has collapsed, however, owing to insufficient support. It is reported that the Allan Royal Mail line proprietary is carrying on negotiations for the purpose of acquiring the contract for the Anglo Canadian service, which was abandoned by Messrs. Petersen, Tate, and Co.

Among the distinguished scientists who attended the Zoological Conference at Cambridge was Professor Hæckel, whose researches with regard to natural development and evolution have been of great value. At the sitting of the conference on Aug. 26th, Professor Hæckel referred to the importance attaching to the discoveries of fossils in lava during recent years, and said that it was no longer a hypothesis that man belonged to the primal order of lemur. Conclusive proof had been afforded that moneys and men were descended from a common stem.

The life imprisonment with solitary confinement in store for the Austrian Empress's assassin is declared by those acquainted with Swiss prisons to be vastly worse than death. A correspondent who recently visited the chief prison of the canton of Vaud, where the assassin will be confined, describes as sad indeed the result of solitary life imprisonment. One man whom he saw, the perpetrator of a series of murders in the mountains, had been in the cell for 15 years, with the result that he completely lost his reason. The governor of the prison confessed that in view of this and other similar cases, his views of capital punishment had undergone a complete change, and that he was now strongly in favour of the death penalty. Mr. Ridgeley, the American consul at Geneva, has been informed by a cabinet officer that, however much it would please the authorities to send the assassin to Austria for trial, it cannot be done under the constitution. Had the crime been committed in the private apartments of the Empress instead of on the public street extradition would have been possible. Upon a sentence of life imprisonment the assassin will be placed in a small, dark cell, from which he will never emerge, and will be fed just enough to enable him to support life.

Sir William des Vœux, in the course of a long letter to the Times on the Far Eastern question, says:—"If Manchuria and Korea were held out as the prize of her successful efforts, Japan's assistance might be counted on almost with certainty as an English ally. As to the doubts which are sometimes expressed whether Japanese would be able to face European troops, I can merely say that they are not entertained by those who know the Japanese best. They are unquestionably brave, and, unlike the Chinese, hold the soldier in high honour. By nature a combative race, and continually spoiling for a fight with somebody, they have devoted much attention to the science of war and have developed extraordinary capacity for military organisation, as shown in their recent conflict with China. With Japan as our ally, she might be safely left to deal with Manchuria alone, while we could devote our whole strength to the Chinese, if they should prove hostile, and to the defence of India. In the course of a few months Russian domination in Manchuria and all prospect of her ultimate control of China would be a thing of the past. As Russia knows all this well (and her fear of Japan was recently shown by her retreat from Korea, easily recognisable as a case of reculer pour mieux sauter hereafter), there is good reason for supposing that her recent proceedings have been taken simply on the assumption that we mean nothing beyond empty protest. "It may therefore be expected that strong action on our part at this moment, if supported in the way indicated, would not only not lead to war, but would probably avert its otherwise certain occurrence in the future. In fact, the only danger of war lies in the possibility that, as before the Crimean War, Russia will not believe us to be in earnest until it is too late for her to retreat."

CHINESE TELEGRAMS.

On Thursday the Asahi received the following telegrams concerning the Chinese situation:—

In the late riots two Japanese were killed.

The marines of the warship Oshima, which is anchoring at Tientsin, had intended to land and proceed to Peking to protect the Japanese Legation, but in deference to the Chinese request the movement was countermanded.

On the afternoon of the 2nd, 50 British marines landed at Taku and next day proceeded to Tientsin with two field guns. There they have been staying upon receipt of the urgent request of the Chinese authorities not to proceed to Peking.

Thirty Russian cavalry, on the 3rd, arrived at Tientsin from Port Arthur, where they are staying for the same reasons as in the case of the British and Japanese.

The Japanese marines have not landed yet.

The Government has decided to send out to China the two warships Suma and Chikushi. The former has already left Yokosuka, and the latter will leave Kure as soon as she has been got ready.

Mr. Yano, the Minister to Peking, will leave Tokyo for his post on the 10th inst.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD AT SINGAPORE.

HIS VIEWS ON THE CHINA QUESTION.

(From the "Hongkong Daily Press.")

Singapore, 24th September.

Lord Charles Beresford on his arrival was met by the Acting Governor and Delegates from the Chamber of Commerce and Straits Settlements Association. He dined at Government House and afterwards addressed a crowded meeting. The position in China, he said, was critical for British trade. His mission aims at focussing the views of Britishers on the spot in order to impress the people at home. He advocates a commercial alliance between Great Britain and Germany and states that Japan is bound to advance. Peace is Great Britain's chief interest. Such union as he recommends would be irresistible and a political alliance might be the possible outcome. Adequate security must be given for capital invested in China. The waterways should be developed and the observance of treaty provisions and the tariffs insisted upon.

YOKOHAMA CHESS CLUB.

The annual general meeting of the Yokohama Chess Club took place on Monday afternoon at Wright's Hotel and was attended by a fair number of members. Mr. Griffin presided.

The minutes of the last general meeting and the report of the Hon. Secretary and Treasurer were taken as read, confirmed, and passed unanimously.

Mr. Griffin was re-elected President, and Mr. Friedlander Hon. Secretary and Treasurer; Messrs. Fox, Thomas, and L. Abenheim being elected on the committee.

It was decided to meet in future at Wright's Hotel, where suitable quarters—for the sole use of the Club—were offered, the meetings to take place as before every Monday and Thursday from 5 to 11 p.m.

The proceedings terminated with a cordial vote of thanks to the president.

REPORT.

Your committee have much pleasure in presenting to members the 8th annual report of the Yokohama Chess Club.

The number of members on the roll is 38 (against 43 at the end of last season) and of this some 8 or 9 have to be deducted at the beginning of the new session, owing to some of the members having left Yokohama. This decrease in the membership is no doubt to be accounted for by the lack of interest shown by members in previous years; for the last season must be considered a fairly successful one, the meetings being mostly well attended and marked by earnest zeal and enthusiasm on the part of the members attending.

In the middle of last October the Club removed its quarters from Clausen's Hotel to Farsari's Photographic Studio, which was found to be a very pleasant and comfortable place. But it being impracticable this year to continue this arrangement, new quarters will have to be found for the ensuing season.

At the commencement of last session the Secretary communicated with the Tokyo Chess Club with the view of arranging a match between the two Clubs; but, as in previous years, without result, the Tokyo Club being unfortunately reduced to a very limited number of players, from which it was found impossible to select a team. However, numerous inter-Club contests were arranged which proved very enjoyable and beneficial to the members.

Mr. Griffin having resigned the championship of the Y.C.C., which he held during the two previous years, a Championship Tourney was played during December-March, from which Mr. Friedlander issued as the victor, thus winning the Club championship for the year 1898 and with it the Keil Champion cup.

The Club has to mourn with deep regret the loss of Mr. Tennant, one of its oldest members, who died in July of this year.

The Treasurer's Account is annexed showing balance in hand of yen 127.22 against yen 154.09 as compared with last year, which is satisfactory considering the higher rent we paid this year.

The committee now tender their resignation with best wishes for the future welfare and prosperity of the Club.

Wm. Friedlander,
Hon. Secretary.

THE DROWNING FATALITY IN THE HARBOUR.

An inquest was opened on Saturday on the body of Caetano Xavier Cabral, late baker on the P. & O steamer Formosa, before Mr. R. G. E. Forster, sitting as coroner, and a Jury consisting of Messrs. H. S. Goddard, J. H. Herring, and C. V. Sale.

The body was identified by Mr. W.R.F. Hickey, chief officer of the Formosa.

Mr. John Holmes, the ship's surgeon, said the cause of death was in the first place congestion of the brain, followed by opium, and drowning. He had only examined the body superficially. There was a large wound two inches long down to the bone over the back of the head, caused in his opinion by deceased striking one of the pillars of the pier. His theory was that deceased in falling struck the pier, and was rendered unconscious before he reached the water. Witness was sitting in his cabin, which was near the gangway, when he heard a splash, and put his head out. He saw two persons standing there and heard the remark, "Throw him a rope." He had heard no sounds which would cause him to believe that deceased under the influence of liquor. Witness had never attended him for any disease. The accident occurred shortly after eleven o'clock.

The Jury then visited the spot and inspected the gangway of the ship, and the inquest was adjourned, until Monday, the Coroner meanwhile issuing an order for burial.

The inquiry was resumed on Monday, when Charles Henry Roper, 3rd engineer of the Rosetta, was called. He said he remembered the evening of Sept. 27th. He witnessed the accident. It was about five minutes past eleven. Mr. Evans, fourth engineer, and himself were walking down the Pier when they saw two people in front of them by the stern of the Formosa. He saw them go on the board connected with the companion ladder of the Formosa, and then one of the men fell from the companion ladder. Witness heard him strike something, as if he had struck the pier in his fall. There was a thud first and then a splash in the water. They both ran to the edge of the pier; Evans jumped on to the fender alongside the pier, and witness called to the quartermaster to bring a light and a rope. While he was bringing a rope they both looked at the water to see the man rise again, but they saw no sign of him. They waited three or four minutes; the quartermaster brought the lamp down, but they could see nothing. From the way in which the deceased and the other man were walking when he first saw them he should say that one at least was under the influence of liquor; that was the one who fell into the water. The other was helping him along. When the deceased fell his companion stood on the ladder and cried, "Baker, baker!" There were no lights on the pier at the time except the electric light. There was one light at the foot of the companion ladder about the height of a man from the bottom step. It was like a riding light. There was no other light there to his knowledge, and he would not swear that there was any light at the top of the ladder. He could not say anything as to the state of the tide. The board leading to the companion ladder was of the kind usually used for that purpose. It was a very dark night. He would himself have no hesitation in mounting the ladder. Efforts were made the same night to recover the body. They were commenced ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after the accident. If the man had come up to the surface at all witness would have been bound to see him. In his opinion the ladder was sufficiently guarded against swaying or moving.

By a Juror—He could not swear whether there was a rope round the board between the pier and the gangway.

John Evans, fourth engineer of the Rosetta, said shortly after eleven o'clock on the evening in question he was with the last witness. After deceased fell witness got under the fender of the Pier, and looked down to the water, but could see no trace of him, and no indication that anything had happened. He could not swear that there were no lights at all on the Pier. The light on the ship was in his opinion sufficient for the lighting of the gangway.

Santon Figuredo, a native of Hindostan, whose evidence was interpreted by Mr. F. J. Norman, said he was employed in the galley of the Formosa. He went for a walk on the night of the accident in company with deceased. They drank some gin during the evening, and returned some time between 10 and eleven o'clock. He said he went first up the gangway, and deceased followed him, and fell. He did not think deceased was drunk; witness had drunk more than he. Witness was about nine feet up the gangway when deceased fell. His going up the ladder would not cause the board at the bottom to shake.

Benjamin Johns said he was quartermaster on the Formosa. He was on watch from eight to twelve o'clock on the night in question. He did not see anything of the accident, but he heard some one call for a rope. The Chief Officer then came up, and when he saw what was the matter ordered witness to get a light at once. Witness went down the ladder with the light; he did not remember where he got it from, as he was too flurried to notice. He lowered the light nearly down to the surface of the water, and went down to look round, but could see nothing. It would be part of his duties as quartermaster to throw a life buoy over in case of accident. He did not do so on this occasion, as he was waiting to see whether the man would get up. Witness was ordered a few minutes after the accident to get a kedge from the mail boat and order all the men up for assistance. They then dragged for the deceased. They had always had a gangway similar to that now used ever since he had been with the Formosa. They had one light at the top of the gangway and one at the bottom. The lower light was about half a man's height from the bottom step of the ladder. The lamps were burning brightly at the time of the accident. There was no rail round the board at the bottom of the ladder; but there was a short man, rope near which a man might take hold of. There were no lights on the Pier.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

On resuming Mr. Hickey, the chief officer, recalled, said he was reading in his cabin when he a heard splash, and went on deck where the witness John told him that a man had fallen overboard. He told John to get a light, and ran down the ladder, and got down on the fender. He had a light lowered, but could see no trace of deceased. He then tried to find traces of bubbles, but could see no sign of them. After staying on the fender for some time he came up on the pier, and asked the Water Police and Custom Officers if they could let him have a drag. They said they hadn't one. Witness then told the quartermaster to turn the hands out and bring the kedge anchor and a line out of the mail boat. Witness dragged the place for about three quarters of an hour, but could find no signs of the body. He remained on the pier himself for about an hour and a half, and left a watch there afterwards. The body was recovered on Saturday morning. He heard some coolies on the pier shouting, and, going along to them, saw the body floating in the water. Witness reported it, and then took the body on board. Witness thought deceased must have been under the influence of liquor to fall over the ladder as he did. He had given instructions for the ladder to be lowered and raised according to the tides, so that the board joining it to the Pier should not be at too sharp an angle. At the time of the accident the angle would be about 30 degrees. He had never received complaints from any one as to the gangway. It was not customary to have a rope barrier round the platform at the bottom of the ladder; it would not be possible in the present instance. The board communicating between the platform of the ladder and the pier was supplied by the Pier Company. There might have been a light at the pier head, but he did not notice it. There were no lights on the pier near the ship. Of nine lamp-pillars on the pier, he believed, only four were fitted with lamps. A life-buoy would have been of no service in a case of this kind, especially if the person who threw it did not know where the man fell. Witness after the accident asked the man Figueda if deceased was drunk, and he replied, "Not too much."

George Frost, chief steward of the Formosa, said deceased joined the ship in October of last year. He was a sober and good, steady man. Witness had never seen him under the influence of liquor. Deceased and Figueda were quite good friends.

Mr. Forster having summed up, the Jury returned the following verdict: "That the deceased came by his death by falling from the ladder of the steamship Formosa on to the piles of the Pier at Yokohama and thence into the sea, about 11.10 p.m. on 27th September, and that the accident was due to the absence of any railing at the foot of the ladder."

THE TRADE OF YOKOHAMA.

In his Report on the Trade and Navigation of Yokohama for the year 1897, Mr. Acting Consul-General Forster states:—

The total trade of the port in 1897 was greater than in the previous year by over £3,500 000. The exact figures of the comparison are as follows:—

Exports...	1897	£ 9,211 820	1896	£ 6,683 745
Imports...	"	8.987.559	"	7 948 637
Total...	"	18 199.379	"	14 632.382

It should be borne in mind that to arrive at a true comparison an addition of 16 per cent. should be made to the value of the imports to cover freight, insurance, &c., the figures in the customs returns representing the values in the country of production.

The increase in exports is mainly attributable to the large advance in the value of the raw silk trade, whereas that in imports is traceable to an increased import of sugar, steam vessels, and railway material.

Of the total export trade of the port the United States take 52 per cent., France 28 per cent., France 28 per cent., and Great Britain and the Colonies 14 per cent. Of the imports Great Britain supplies 52 per cent., the United States 13 per cent, Germany 12 per cent., and China 9 per cent.

Gold coin and bullion has been imported to the value of £6,699,320, and exported to the value of £900,156; while silver has been imported to a value of £1,749,124, and exported to the amount of £1,051,714.

Of last year's total British trade, amounting to £6,047,013, two-thirds were with the United Kingdom itself, one-sixth with Hongkong, and the remaining sixth was distributed between India, Canada, and Australia. Though the total value of the trade with Australia was only £101,000, this was an increase of 33 per cent. on that of the previous year. The imports are mainly lead and wool, but the customs returns show that in addition to a considerable export of rice, a steady and increasing demand is springing up for Japanese manufactured articles such as silk piece-goods, floor matting, and fancy goods. The trade with Canada shows a slight increase due to the larger export of tea. The increased import of raw cotton and sugar is accountable for the increase shown in the value of imports from British India and Hongkong respectively.

IMPORTS.

The value of the import of cotton yarn shows a decrease over that of last of over £140,000. This decrease would appear to be occasioned by the competition of the Japanese spinning mills in the lower grades. A continual and increasing demand, however, exists for gassed yarns. A marked decrease is observable in the import of grey shirtings and T-cloths. The import of blankets in 1897 has fallen to less than one third of that in 1896. The competition of the local Japanese factories is evidently severely affecting this article.

A continued advance in freight on metals, which reached as high as 32s. 6d. per ton at the end of the year combined with firmer markets in Europe has made business difficult during the year. The United States are now supplying part of the demand for this market and are likely to be an increasing source of supply for manufactured iron as also pig-iron. The trade in wire nails, which was formerly done solely with Belgium and Germany, has now been practically absorbed by the United States. A large increase is noticeable in the import of galvanised sheet-iron. This may be attributed to the fashion, which is rapidly gaining ground in Japan, of substituting sheet-iron for timber in roofing. The trade is greatly interfered with by the heavy claims made by buyers for the corrosion which appears inevitable when galvanised iron is transported by sea. The margin of profit for the British importer is consequently narrowed to a serious extent. Plate and sheet-iron show a falling-off in import, due to the fact that the demand for the former has been almost supplanted by that for Siemen's steel.

Locomotive engines have been imported to a value of £316.415 in 1897, as against £96,466 in 1896. The United States share with Great Britain this trade, but the former has by far the larger proportion. The various items of machinery show a large increase over last year. In dynamo electric machinery the United States has supplied nearly seven-tenths of the total, the remainder coming from Germany and Great Britain in nearly equal proportions. In spinning machinery Great Britain has practically a monopoly, whereas in that for paper-making the import is about equal from the United States and Great Britain.

The import of railway carriages and fittings shows an increase of over £50,000 on that of 1896. Great Britain supplies practically the whole of these goods. Such frequent reference has been made in previous reports to the necessity of the manufacturer strictly complying with the specification of machinery required for sale in Japan that it would appear superfluous to refer to the matter again. It may, however, be of interest to relate that at a dinner give to a Canadian Commercial Commissioner, a large Japanese buyer of machinery stated in the hearing of the writer that although infinitely preferring the quality of British manufactured machinery, he had been obliged to transfer his orders to the United States and Germany, as he experienced such difficulty in obtaining from the English manufacturer the exact article he required. In view of the increasing competition of the United States in the metal trade too much care cannot be used by the British manufacturer in securing uniformity of quality and weight in such articles as steel rails. Many heavy claims have been given rise to from the failure to supply an article strictly in accordance with sample.

The import of kerosene shows a large increase over that of 1896. The total deliveries were:—American, 1,679,791 cases; Russian, 1,135.157 cases; Langkat, 48,862 cases; total, 2,863,813. An increase of deliveries of American oil over 1896 of 413,518 cases, and of Russian of 130.559 cases. The production of Japanese kerosene is estimated at 500,000 cases annually.

Ten steamers of the value of £618,232 were imported into Yokohama during the year under review. Of these, nine were built in Great Britain for the Nippon Yusen Kaisha (Japan Mail Steamship Company).

EXPORTS.

Silk.—The total export of raw silk for the year under review was 9,226,481 lbs. valued at £5,649,969, as against 5,225,179 lbs., valued at £3.123,229 in 1896. The supplies for the season 1896 97 amounted to 6,886,000 lbs., as against 8,426,666 lbs. for the season 1895 96. Stocks at the end of 1897 amounted to 1,238,666 lbs., making together with the export from the opening of the new season in July to the end of the year, the total available supplies for that period 7,044,000 lbs., as against 5,619,333 lbs, for the same period in 1899.

The quantity of cocoons produced was fully 25 per cent. in excess of the previous season. The silk conditioning-house, established here, was not viewed at first with favour by the Japanese merchants. They are decidedly opposed to the great exactness which the new system brings into the weighing of silk, and prefer to make use of the scales used by foreign buyers. In other directions, however, especially in testing silk for its size of thread, elasticity, tenacity, and cleanliness, the conditioning-house is becoming more used. Taken as a whole, the crop of the year under review must be considered a good one, and must have proved most lucrative to the producer.

One of the most noticeable features of the trade of the year under review is the large increase in the export of silk piece-goods (habutãe). In 1896 the value of this commodity exported was £721,769, whereas in 1897 it had risen to £911,266. Silk handkerchiefs, on the other hand, show a heavy decline, the demand in Europe, and especially in America, displaying a great falling-off.

Tea.—The total export of tea from Yokohama, as shown by the customs returns, amounted to 26.518,298 lbs., valued at £512,922. The total delivery for the season, as shown by the statistics of the Chamber of Commerce, was 27,266,419 lbs. The quality of the crop was not satisfactory, and not equal to last year, especially as regards the make of the leaf, which was coarse, and showed signs of hurried preparation and insufficient care in rolling. The Japanese merchant does not appear to realise the vital importance of keeping up the standard of the tea, in view of the increasing competition in Indian and Ceylon teas.

Although the quantity of tea exported in 1897 was much the same as in the 1896, the value shows a considerable increase. This may be attributed to two causes—first, the duty agitation in the United States, which occasioned a general rush to get teas landed in America before the new tariff came into force, and secondly, to the increased cost of labour, charcoal, and all materials connected with the preparation of the leaf. Prices throughout the year have averaged some $6 per picul higher than in 1896. In May, owing to the duty agitation referred to above, they rose as much as from $15 to $17 per picul higher than last year for similar grades.

Copper.—The export of copper calls for little remark; the figures show a decrease on those for last year. There was a little variation in prices during the year, quotations averaging 26 yen 50 sen per picul for slabs, and 27 yen 50 sen for ingots.

The output from the Ashio mines has been reduced, owing to its being necessary to carry out extensive works to prevent the passage of deleterious matter from the mines into the water-courses below.

Cotton Manufactures show a considerable increase in the item of cotton yarn, a small decrease in piece-goods, and a large falling-off in the export of cotton flannel. Hongkong and China form the principal markets for these goods.

Sundries.—The export of fish oil in 1897 shows an increase of over £24,000 on that of 1896. The export of paper in 1897 shows an increase of nearly £12,000 over that of the previous year. The Japanese paper known as gampishi is finding great favour both in Europe and America as copying paper, it being more durable and capable of receiving a larger number of impressions than the home-manufactured article. The export of Japanese wall-paper also shows a considerable increase over last year. Amongst miscellaneous exports the items of clothing, ginger, straw-plaits, and umbrellas, show an increase during the past year, whereas those of iriko, or bêche-de-mer, manganese, menthol crystal, sulphur, and tobacco display a considerable falling-off.

SHIPPING.

Last year there entered this port 2,319 merchant vessels of an aggregate of 2,894,413 tons, as against 2,085 vessels of 2,757,335 tons in 1896, showing an increase of 234 in the number and 137,478 in the tonnage. British shipping shows a decrease of 62 vessels and 61,227 tons, whereas Japanese shows an increase of 300 vessels and 170,792 tons. The greater portion of the increase is in steamers, of which 1,675 entered the port in 1897, against 1,394 in 1896. The expansion in Japanese steam navigation is most remarkable, and is mainly due to the energetic extension of its business by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha (Japan Mail Steamship Company). This company has now regular monthly communication with Europe, the United States, Australia, and Bombay, in addition to lines to Shanghai, Hongkong and Vladivostock. The steamers on the European line are of the highest class and of 6,000 tons gross.

GENERAL.

Currency.—On Oct. 1 the introduction of the gold standard was effected without hitch or difficulty. Preparations had been made in anticipation, by the Bank of Japan, for the exchange on and from that date of all silver yen presented to it or its authorised representatives for gold yen. On the date in question the balance at the various banks were thus converted into gold. There was but little demand for the exchange of gold against paper, and the paper currency of the country has thus remained the ordinary circulating medium, representing gold in place of silver. The export of gold to the value of £900,156 was due to the large amount of silver yen-pieces which were brought up from Hongkong and the Straits Settlements for exchange against gold, in view of their enhanced value. This movement has continued during the present year. The effect of the introduction of the gold standard has, on the one hand, been to steady exchange with gold countries, but on the other, to dislocate those with silver-using countries in the Far East. The benefit to importers has also been considerable in view of the further fall of silver amounting to 7 per cent.

Docks.—The Yokohama Dock Company's No 2 dock was opened in April, and received up to the end of the year thirty-one steamers and four sailing vessels. It is calculated that No. 1 dock will be completed by January, 1899; the construction of a third dock is also under consideration. The necessary work shops are nearly completed and will shortly be in full working power. The docks at Uraga at the mouth of Tokyo Bay, of which the dimensions were also given in last year's report, are not yet opened.

Railways.—The extension of the railway system in the country steadily continues, and there are at present 1,594 miles of new line under construction, of which 612 miles are Government and 982 miles private undertakings. The doubling of the trunk line between this place and Kobe has now been earnestly taken in hand, but some time must elapse before it is completed. A greatly accelerated mail service is looked forward to on the completion of the work.

Custom House.—In consequence of the increased volume of imports the customs ground became for some time so blocked with goods of all kinds that no space was available for further landings. An extension of the premises is urgently needed. Further dredging of the harbour in the vicinity of the pier is also imperative. At present the north side is useless for large vessels owing to the shallowness of the water.

Population.—The Japanese of the town of Yokohama on Dec. 31st, 1897, amounted to 188,455 persons, and of the town of Kanagawa to 15,244, or 203,699 persons in all—an increase of 7,090 during the year 1897. The foreign population of Yokohama, exclusive of Chinese, amounted on the same date to 2,096 persons, of whose 869 were British. This shows an increase during the twelve months of 269 persons in the general foreign population, and of one in the British by itself. The Chinese population is returned at 2,015.

Direct Trade.—The responsibility of putting a home firm into direct communication with the Japanese merchant is one from which any Consul having experience of Japanese methods of business would shrink. He has no resource but to lay such matters before British houses doing business in the place. These are kept fully posted by their representatives at home in regard to any new inventions or manufactures, and they, being in constant contact with the Japanese buyer, can at once order such goods from home if they consider they could be profitably imported into this country. The representation on the spot of home manufacturers by responsible agents would, and does, secure a satisfactory return; firms, however, which do not see their way to be thus represented would do better to place themselves in communication with the London agents of mercantile houses in Japan, who could tell them at once if their goods were likely to find a market in this country. It is to be desired that organisations similar to those in the United States, devoted to bringing into close relation the manufacturer, the importer, and the exporter, with the object of extending trade could be devised in Great Britain. These institutions do not enter into trade; their sole object is through the building up of an international bureau of commercial information to aid in the development of foreign commerce. Subscribers to them can at once obtain on the spot reliable information as to the classes of goods exported to or imported from any country, together with particulars of firms doing business in the various branches. Information thus obtained would unquestionably be of greater value than that supplied by a Consul, who has no personal knowledge of the status of his correspondents.

THE FRENCH AT FASHODA.

POSITION VIEWED AS SERIOUS

London, September 16 h.

News has been received of the occupation of Fashoda, on the White Nile, south of Khartoum, by the French expedition under Major Marchand, assisted by 10,000 Abyssinians.

The Daily Telegraph's special correspondent with the Anglo-Egyptian forces in the Soudan telegraphs that he has had an interview with the captain of the boat which returned from Fashoda, and that the captain's description of the flag raised leaves no doubt that it is French. The Captain says the garrison at Fashoda menaced him and would have sunk his boat if they had possessed a gun. After getting out of the zone of the garrison's fire, the captain landed and ascertained from natives that the Dervishes at Fashoda had been attacked by a force of Europeans and 100 Senegalese soldiers, who defeated the Dervishes, killing 100, and drove the others from the town. The correspondent adds: "There is no doubt that this is the Marchand expedition."

The despatch was sent from Assouan, and the captain interviewed belonged to the steamer Tewfikh, one of the Dervish steamers which surrendered to General Kitchener on its return from Fashoda.

The correspondent described General Kitchener's efforts to prevent the news reaching England. He says:—"I wired this identical news a week ago from Omdurman. The Sirdar refused to allow any correspondent to accompany him south of Omdurman or to go independently. He compelled us to sell our horses and camels and then told us unless we returned northward forthwith he could not guarantee us transportation.

General Kitchener has sent 800 Soudanese, 200 men of the Cameron Highlanders, two batteries of Nordenfeldt mountain guns, and several Maxims on board the gunboats Sultan and Sheikh. The Sirdar accompanies the force on the steamer Dal. Probably they have already arrived at Fashoda. The correspondent says also, detailing an earlier movement, that the gunboat Sultan was sent up the Blue Nile to intercept a Dervish garrison, 2,500 strong, coming up to re enforce the Khalifa. The gunboat found and engaged the enemy, killing a thousand and driving the remainder back. He adds:—"It is officially announced that the Khalifa is surrounded and must be taken, alive or dead, within a few days."

TENSION IN LONDON.

New York, Sept. 16.

A cable from London says:—The Fashoda question between England and France has entered upon a very grave stage. All the elements of a rupture are provided by the situation. There is no mistaking the stern determination of the English people that Fashoda shall not belong to France. The French press, on the other hand, notably the semi-official Temps, has been steadily stiffening in its resolve to hold on to Major Marchand's prize. The news of the result of General Kitchener's advance to Fashoda is therefore awaited with the keenest anxiety.

It has been stated here that General Kitchener started for Fashoda without fresh instructions from his Government. It is stated on authority that this is not so. He asked for and received instructions by telegraph, fresh instructions in view of the discovery that Major Marchand had forestalled him on the Upper Nile. This fact renders the situation all the more serious if he adopts hostile measures against the French explorers, as he will be acting under express authority from the British Government.

What his instructions are the Foreign Office here declines to disclose.

The truth is that Lord Salisbury dares not surrender Fashoda. If is a fact, patent to any competent observer, that the mood of the English people at this moment is strongly warlike. In their present temper Englishmen will tolerate no concession, graceful or otherwise, in relation to Fashoda. Even entering upon any dallying negotiations would ruin the Government. On the other hand France is not the country to receive an affront with equanimity, so that the tension of feeling here, until this Fashoda affair is settled, can be appreciated.

INTENDED ULTIMATUM.

London, Sept. 17.

A despatch to the Morning Post says General Kitchener has absolute authority to claim Fashoda as Egyptian territory and to expel the present occupants forcibly if necessary. Fashoda, the correspondent says, will then be occupied by an Egyptian garrison.

The Daily Telegraph's Cairo correspondent says that General Kitchener intends to present an ultimatum demanding that the French expedition under Major Marchand quit Fashoda forthwith.

LATE EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE ASSASSIN.

New York, Sept. 13.

A cable from Geneva says:—Through the assistance of Mr. B. H. Ridgley, United States Consul here, a correspondent was enabled to-day to see and interview the Assassin Luchini. He is a smirking wretch, effusive, garrulous, and beaming. Luchini is small and gaunt, but athletic, with blue eyes, reddish moustache, and dirty brown hair, cut short and unparted. He smiled and tittered as he talked, cheerfully answering all of the correspondent's questions. His demeanour suggested an unhinged mind, but his replies indicated a clear and and full consciousness of his crime, in which he gloried. In answer to a query by the correspondent, Luchini said: "I killed the Empress because I am an Anarchist. We have not, we eat not, we drink not: therefore, we must make the rich and powerful think about us. I have simply executed my mission."

"Why did you select the Empress? Why not have killed a real ruler, King or President?"

"Destiny placed her in my way," he answered simply and with apparent truthfulness. "I was not looking for her life in particular. She was here and I struck her. She was one of the oppressors."

"Had you any accomplices?"

"My accomplices are all those who suffer, I am the executor of the oppressed."

Luchini declined to answer further questions, and the interview ended.

Judge Leche showed the correspondent the file (at first described as a stiletto) with which the crime was committed. It is about four inches long, very sharp at the point and with keen edges. Its wooden handle would afford a strong grip. Its construction makes it far more effective than an ordinary dagger penetrating clothes, but if Luchini had failed to reach a vital organ with it the wound would have been slight. Judge Leche asked Luchini:

"Where were you on August 30th, when the the Empress arrived at Territet?"

"I was employed in building the post-office," he answered.

"Did you strike the Empress with the left hand?"

"Certainly not; I always use my right hand, and I dealt this one with my right hand."

This with an ugly grimace, and then he bent down and showed how he dealt the blow. The Judge next asked: "If you had been able would you have murdered King Humbert or Crispi?"

"Humbert, oh yes," he said with pleasure. "But not Crispi; Crispi is a thief and he stole half a million lire; I should have taken more in his place; I take my hat off to thieves; I would never murder a thief."

Here the assassin laughed aloud. Then he said to the Judge: "I asked for cigars; shall I get them?"

"We will see," said the Judge, as he ordered him back to prison.

ITALIANS MOBBED AT TRIESTE.

London, September 13.

Special despatches from Vienna says that the entire Austro-Hungarian empire is inflamed against the Italians as a result of the assassination of the Empress Elizabeth, and that violent anti-Italian demonstrations have taken place at Trieste, where the Italians and natives have been fighting in the streets with sticks and stones and sometimes using revolvers. Six deaths are reported to have occurred there and troops were called out to suppress the disturbances.

At Gratz an Italian peddler has been lynched, and at Vienna fully 1,500 Italian employed on the municipal works have been summarily dismissed in order to avoid a popular revolt. The Italian Embassy at Vienna is guarded by a strong body of infantry.

ANARCHISTS IN ITALY.

Rome, September 13.

An Anarchist manifesto, signed by the "revolution committee" has been distributed in Milan during the past few days. The police yesterday arrested an Italian, who was engaged in distributing the manifesto. The prisoner, who had just arrived from Switzerland when he was seized, shouted, "Long live anarchy! Death to the King!"

Some of the people in the crowd present at the time of the arrest interfered with the police officers who made the capture, and several persons were injured before the prisoner was lodged in the police depot. The newspapers here remark that the recent riots at Milan commenced in a similar manner.

BRINGING THE BODY TO VIENNA.

Geneva, September 14.

The casket containing the remains borne on a four-horse car and followed by two other cars almost buried in floral offerings, was conveyed to the railroad station here at 8.30 this morning. An enormous concourse of people witnessed the ceremony. The corrège was led by the representatives of the imperial court, followed by the Federal Council, headed by the President, and the Geneva Council. The firemen lined the streets. The brilliant sunshine made a striking contrast to the gloomy aspect of the mourners. The funeral train left here at 9 o'clock.

The funeral car was ornamented with silver wreaths, surmounted by a silver cross, and had white plumes at each corner. The casket was of polished oak, with silver mountings. It was almost hidden beneath floral tributes.

On the arrival of the hearse at the railroad station, which was hung with black drapery, the coffin was removed, the remains of the Empress were ceremoniously blessed, and the casket was placed in the railroad car, which was then sealed. After this the Austrian officials embarked on the train and it departed.

The train made short stoppages at the principal towns in Swiss territory. Everywhere along the route church bells tolled, and in some places wreaths were presented.

The assassin, it is said, has written to the President of the Swiss Confederation asking to be tried at Lucerne, where capital punishment is in force. He now admits that he attended an Anarchist club at Lausanne, where it was decided to assassinate some great personage. Six members of the club have been placed under arrest.

The assassination has produced a great revulsion of feeling among the Swiss people in favour of capital punishment.

Vienna, Sept. 16.

The public were permitted to view the casket containing the remains of the late Empress of Austria to-day. It reposed on a catafalque in the chapel of the Hofburg, where masses for the repose of the soul of the deceased were celeprated incessantly at three altars until noon.

On the casket were four wreaths sent by the children and grand-children of the deceased, while many other floral offerings were upon the walls of the chapter. At the head of the casket were the imperial crown, the coronet of an archduchess and the jewelled orders of the late Empress. At the foot of the casket were a black fan and a pair of white gloves. Life Guardsmen were stationed at each corner of the catafalque. There was a steady procession of people until the church was closed at 5 o'clock, among them Prince Albert of Belgium and other personages of high rank. Even after the doors were closed thousands remained outside.

The Presidents of both houses of the Austrian and Hungarian Parliaments deposited wreaths near the casket.

After the blessing of the remains, Emperor Francis Joseph knelt down and repeatedly kissed the coffin. He asked the maids of honour whether her Majesty suffered much. They replied that she did not.

It transpires that a painful scene occurred at the church. The Emperor was prostrated with grief. Upon arriving at the Hofburg chapel on Thursday night, his Majesty became almost unconscious from the intensity of his emotion. Many of those present wept in sympathy.

In accordance with the Emperor's wishes the remains will be interred beside those of Crown Prince Rudolph. The interment on Saturday, therefore, will be only temporary.

Solution of Problem No. 388.

It seems there are two solutions to this problem, one, the author's, being as follows :—

Correct solutions received from S.S. and Marco. The second key move, sent in by W.H.S. and Skak, viz:—B to Q 2 also solves the problem which is a pity; for the problem is otherwise a beautiful composition.

NOTES.

(a) Not a good move, as the Kt remains in an unfavourable position after 8..... ■ to K 5.

(b) If P to B 3, then P takes P, followed by B to Q 4.

(c) P to Kt 3 should have been played, the sacrifice with B takes P ch being somewhat obvious.

(d) Of course, White's game cannot be saved, but the text-move accelerates the conclusion.

Game No. 437.

Of the following game, The Times says :—This appears to be one of the finest games in the Vienna tournament, in spite of the fact that Herr Marco did not conduct the defence well. He handled his Knights badly, especially the Q Kt. Dr. Tarrasch played the game in his most characteristic fashion, 26—Kt to K 6 was prettier, but P takes Kt would be answered by P takes P, leaving B and Kt exposed. The finish is very charming.

Mail News.

Dr. Tarrasch, the winner of five tournaments, has, according to the Neue Wiener Tagblatt, declared his intention not to engage in any more tournaments or matches, but to give his whole time and energy to his profession. The Chess-world can not afford to lose one of its greatest masters, and we do not think that the Doctor will sink into oblivion and be entirely swallowed up to medicine.

The living First-Prize Winners are Blackburne, Burne, Charousek, Gunsberg, Lasker, Mason, Pillsbury, Steinitz, Tarrasch, Tschigorin, Winawer, Bardeleben, A. Schwartz, Walbrodt, and Weiss tied for first.

The Ladies' Chess Club, says the Pall Mall Gazette, of July 6 h, are to be credited with another success in the line of chess entertainment. Instead of meeting in the stuffy clubroom in the summer they are now endeavouring to arrange chess garden parties while the London season lasts. The first of these took place last Saturday at the house of Mrs. P. I. Edwards, at Merton Park, and proved a great success. A handicap for a handsome set of chessmen was arranged for eight ladies, while later on Mr. Bowles played twenty members of the club simultaneously. In the evening a match between Wimbledon and the Ladies resulted in a close fight of 6 to 5 in favour of Wimbledon.

It is suggested than an effort might well be made by Australian chess-players with a view to one or two of their cracks taking part in a great tourney in Europe. "The Vienna list is certainly a strong one, but there is no doubt that Mr. E. M. Wallace and Mr. J. L. Jacobsen, and, perhaps, a few more of our leading players, would give a good account of themselves, even in the Vienna company."

Mr. Emanuel Lasker is very busy studying in Berlin, and will not resume chess until October, when he returns to England.

Says The Times, Philadelphia :—

"In the field of Chess there have been many magazines devoted to the art in the last sixty years, but nearly all have failed to make themselves sufficiently attractive to insure more than a lingering existence at best. Not even the brilliancy of La Bourdonnais, the wit of St. Amant, the learning of Staunton, the renown of Morphy, nor the profundity of Steinitz, could make their magazines 'go.' There was something lacking, nor was it supplied until Mr. William Borsodi appeared upon the scene with his new American Chess Magazine, which is now in the second year of its existence.

Mr. Borsodi was the first to appreciate the fact that, for a Chess-magazine to be successful it must not have the repelling appearance of a census-report, but must vie with the beautiful literary magazines in its get-up—must not only have matter, but manner—not only illustration by word, but illustration by picture—and it must charm the eye as well as improve the mind."

The publishers expect that the September number, now in the press, will "supersede" all previous numbers.

Quick Telegraphy.

Sir George Newnes said that a Blackburne move was sent to Pillsbury, and Pillsbury replied inside 30 seconds. The 7,000 miles of the double journey was covered in half a minute, which included the time required by Pillsbury to make up his mind and record his move. This was in the late cable match between London and New York.

"Skittles."

The word "Skittles," in Chess-parlance, is used, generally, to designate games in which the players move first and look afterward. These games give to Chess-nomenclature such expressions as, "I didn't see it"; "That is a fluke"; "I should have done so and so," etc. In London, at the present time, "Express Tournaments" (30 moves in 15 minutes) are quite popular: while in the U.S. we have what we call Rapid-Transit Tournaments. These have been, by some persons, called "Skittle Tournaments," and are condemned as cultivating a loose and careless style of play. Mr. L. Van Vliet, however, recommends them, and as it is rather a novelty to hear any one championing "Skittles," his words are worth quoting :—

"We cannot conceive of a more insufferable bore than a slow and tedious Chess player. . . . Apart from all this we believe in encouraging rough-and-tumble play, especially among young players, games in which the player is not afraid to let himself go, as it were. . . . If the history of the great players be traced it will be found in every case that their early training consisted in playing what we term 'Skittles.' From Skittles they learned how to combine, and to be bold, and not to be afraid of any opponent, but to play the game for what it is worth. Nothing is more amusing than to hear a player explain when he loses (never when he wins), 'I should not have played so in a match, you know, but "Skittles," what does it matter?' He leaves you to infer with awe what fearful havoc he would have played with you—how he would have pulverized you if only he had been playing a match-game. Alas! for human vanity! There have been and there are exceptions, but as a rule, in fact, in about 99 cases out of 100 the better off hand player is invariable also the better match-player."—Literary Digest.

Pillsbury Notes.

From The Illustrated American.

In his first appearance among the Chess-masters of the world, in the Hastings Tournament—a difficult position for even a veteran—his steadiness and nerve were admirable, and secured the famous victory, as he termed it "for America, the Brooklyn Chess Club, and myself." Such self-possession almost invariably characterizes his play. In his recent match with Showalter he was always promptly on hand—usually a little before the appointed hour—and until the time for play had come chatted pleasantly with friends, among whom his redoubtable opponent is to be reckoned. The opening moves, even in games following familiar lines, were made cautiously after brief but careful study. As the play developed new positions more time was given to deliberation, but in nearly all cases Pillsbury kept his game well in hand and had time to spare. When a critical situation was reached, requiring an extended analysis looking ahead many moves, it was evident that he was using every faculty in the intensity of the conflict as he grappled with the problem before him. As he leaned forward over the board there was usually a very slight movement of the head as he glanced rapidly from one part of the field to another, and an almost imperceptible motion of the eyelids, apparently marking the stage in the long analysis. As each variation was thus traced out one could usually tell when another line of play was under consideration, and a slight smile sometimes indicated that he had satisfied himself as to the outcome of that variation. When in the midst of a hard battle, he could see victory within his reach his usually impassive countenance would light up with signs of satisfaction. In one of his games Showalter had accepted a tempting bait, going far into his opponent's flank and capturing a Pawn with his Queen. He deliberated long before doing this, evidently suspecting that there was a trap in it, but thought he saw a way of escape. Meanwhile Pillsbury, as he often did, was walking up and down the room. When he heard the clock turned, which indicated that a move had been made, and seeing that the bait had been taken, he indulged for a single moment in a smile, expressing elation. The bearing of these masters to each other was always the embodiment of perfect courtesy, and never, even in the stress of the contest or under the chagrin of defeat, was there anything but the most gentlemanly demeanour. This did not interfere in the least with the hardest kind of play over the board, the winning of each game being with both the supreme object of the hour. But when the battle was over there was never anything like exultation over the fallen foe, but rather the desire, by silence or some considerate remark, to allay the bitterness of the defeat; as when, at the conclusion of his first match with Showalter, Pillsbury said to him in reply to his congratulation, "Yes, I won the match, but you played the better Chess."

According to the American Chess Magazine, "Harry N. Pillsbury's playing in the Vienna Tournament stamps him as the coming champion, the step beyond Mr. Lasker being seemingly but a short one. The world's championship is a title which all Americans will feel is now justly due to our greatest player, and it is to be hoped that the time is not far distant when there will be an opportunity to bring it across the ocean again."

Showalter is reported to be anxious to have another bout with Pillsbury for the United States premiership. It is hardly likely that he will be encouraged in this respect, after the outcome of the Vienna tourney.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

THE PEKING ENIGMA.

It is impossible to view the progress of affairs in China without considerable uneasiness. The telegrams say that after the Foreign Representatives had decided to summon detachments of marines to Peking for the purpose of protecting the Legations and the small foreign community in that city, the Tsung-li Yamén earnestly protested against such a measure, on the very natural ground that it would be humiliating to China and that nothing of the kind had ever been considered necessary in the past. A meeting of the Corps Diplomatique was held to consider the protest, and the decision arrived at was that the circumstances did not warrant any departure from the programme previously contemplated. Of course the presence of a few scores of foreign marines in Peking is not, in itself, a matter of much consequence. But the fact that the foreign Representatives should have discerned danger calling for such a step is unpleasantly significant. The conditions in Peking are altogether different from those in the provinces. There is no Chou Han in the capital to issue anti-Christian brochures, nor are there any missionaries to disturb the people's traditional beliefs. If danger menaces foreigners, it has its source in politics. In short, the only inference we can draw from the decision of the Chefs de Mission is that they regard the recent revolution as not merely conservative but also anti-foreign. If that be so, there is no telling what the situation may bring forth. During the past year China has been subjected by foreign Powers to the slicing process which she is herself accustomed to employ in the case of her worst criminals, and the question is, has she really begun to appreciate what is going on, and is she beginning to think that unless she make a struggle, her execution will be only a matter of time? If we could answer in the affirmative, there would be one satisfactory feature at any rate in the outlook. But a strong movement of national self-assertion, directed by the retrogressive Manchus, and a similar movement inspired by the spirit of progress, are two very different things; the one provoking as much antipathy as the other would attract sympathy. Still more urgent questions, however, in our opinion, are the manner in which the foreign Powers will treat the situation, and the effect likely to be produced by the presence of foreign marines in Peking. Those that seek opportunities may easily find them in the conjunctures not unlikely to arise, and those that do not wish the slicing process to become an execution, may be driven to more than diplomatic protests.

The great difficulty of the reform party in China was that they were entirely without military strength. Behind the men that planned the Meiji revolution in Japan stood the Samurai of Satsuma and Choshu, the best soldiers in the empire. Such attempts as the conservatives made to stem the tide of progress were quickly crushed. But the Chinese reformers consisted of the youthful Emperor only and a small band of unarmed patriots, courageous indeed, and intelligent, but helpless in the face of physical resistance. Probably they cherished some vague hope that the nations whose sympathy and encouragement they received—England and Japan—would extend to them something more than moral support. On the other hand, the whole military strength of the country was under the control of the Manchu politicians and therefore at the disposal of the Empress Dowager. One possible means of supplying their deficiency presented itself to the reformers. It was Yuen Shi-kai. Representative of China at the Korean court in the days when the Peninsular Kingdom virtually acknowledged the suzerainty of Peking, Yuen showed himself a man of forceful character and great moral resource. For several years, indeed, he played in Söul the part of an omnipotent dictator. Subsequently appointed to command a corps d'armée in the Ying-chow campaign, he showed his address by escaping all responsibility for the Japanese successes, and later on, when his patron, Li Hung-chang, fell from power, Yuen survived his fall and is now at the head of the foreign-drilled troops of Tientsin, "Li's army" as they were called. Splendid looking troops they were too, ten years ago. Men of grand physique, well set up, carefully drilled and admirably armed—thirty-seven thousand of them. But when the war came, "where were they?" Some said that they were shattered at Ping-yang; some that they melted away in the retreat from the Yalu; some that the only stand they ever made was at Kinchou. Whatever befel them then, they are once more organized at Tientsin now, and Yuen Shi-kai commands them. The reformers made a stupendous mistake about Yuen. They thought that they could enlist his sympathy and obtain the support of his corps. Perhaps Yuen purposely educated their misplaced confidence. Perhaps they inferred his sentiments from the foreign character of his troops' tactics. At any rate they showed their hand to him and he at once betrayed them to their enemies. Of course their error only precipitated events. Without a military backing their cause must have collapsed sooner or later.

On the 23rd of September, Mr. Yuen—then acting Viceroy of Chihli, if we are not mistaken—entertained a number of Russian officers at dinner in the Astor House in Tientsin. We have that fact on the authority of Mr. Ooka Ikuzo, who was in Peking at the time. There is no general reason why Yuen Shi-Kai should not dine and wine Russian officers if he pleases, as many as he pleases and as often as he pleases. But the 21st of September was the day of the revolutionary movement in Peking, and if Mr. Yuen did not know that suspicions of Russian complicity were certain to be entertained, he must have suddenly lapsed into a condition of moral obtuseness very inconsistent with his record. He knew it perfectly well, we may assume, and whether he acted defiantly or imprudently in organizing a Russian banquet at such a time, the public can judge. We are glad that his guests were not English officers.

There are some comments of Mr. Ooka's which deserve to be reproduced. Russia has thirteen thousand troops at Port Arthur, he says, and can easily send a strong force to Peking, should she find it convenient to do so. Unless Japan and England are content to see China's progressive movement permanently checked, they must break the military strength of Yuen Shi-kai and set limits to the armed potentialities of Russia. The Czar's peace proposals are not to be depended on for a moment. Suffer things to drift a little longer in the present channel and China will inevitably become what Korea was eighteen months ago.

Thirteen thousand troops are just one half of the number assigned by rumour to Port Arthur. Rumour has probably been at its old trick of doubling figures. We have never believed in twenty-six thousand. Whence could they have come and how? As to Russia's easily moving in force upon Peking, we venture to doubt it altogether. To move by land would be a stupendous operation. It would mean preparations on a vast scale; the organization of an immense transport service, and the early spring to commence the movement. Some people may say that it would be easy to carry the troops from the Liaotung Peninsula across the Gulf of Pechili. Certainly it would, provided that Russia had full command of the sea, a condition which depends on England and Japan. But in truth such an eventuality as an armed Russian advance upon Peking does not deserve to be seriously considered. The thing is out of the question at present. Russia is not ready for any such enterprise, even if she had the mind to undertake it. Of course we are not suggesting that she had no share in the recent complication. Very likely she has been playing for her own hand, like all her rivals in the field. But the project that suggests itself to her is not connected with any such contingency as a military advance upon Peking. Her policy, a very natural policy, is to bring about a state of affairs which will necessitate a definite understanding between the Occidental Powers interested in China. It is perfectly clear to everybody that the purpose of certain States in pushing China towards progress is to educate her capacity for self-defence, and that Russia is the country against which the precaution is taken. But Russia does not care to sit quietly awaiting the maturity of these preparations to oust her. She prefers to keep China in the old groove, or to reduce her affairs to a condition so chaotic that England and Japan must abandon the idea of setting her on her feet and enter into some sort of general compact for the division of her substance. If we believed in China's resurrection, we should doubt the possibility of Russia's success. But it seems to us that the current of events is with the Northern Power, and that China will ultimately be found to have committed suicide at the latter's bidding without detecting the craft which induced her to raise her hand against herself.

It would seem that the Manchu statesmen in Peking construe the reform movement not as the result of a genuinely progressive impulse, but as a political scheme to overthrow Tartar authority and replace it by Chinese sway. They are said to be daily eliminating the friends of reform from the administrative sphere, and substituting for them men of Manchu origin, so that the government will soon be Manchu pure and simple. Such a method of procedure greatly augments the danger of the situation, for it invests the question with a racial, instead of a merely moral, character. The struggle will no longer be between conservatives and liberals, but between Manchu and Chinese. On the other hand, the prospect for reform will be distinctly improved if it becomes the watchword of natives against aliens. It would be a strange thing if a wave of Western civilization were to sweep the usurping dynasty out of the high places of the empire. We have been accustomed to think that the fall of the dynasty must precede any successful advance towards reform, because the whole organization of the Manchu system of government makes for conservatism. But there is a possibility that reform, instead of being the consequence, may prove to be the cause, of the Manchus' fall.

The new "Legation Guards" entered Peking on the 7th instant. There were 66 Russians from Port Arthur, including 25 troopers; and there were 48 German marines and 48 British. The Germans made their entry subsequently to the other two detachments. The numbers, though numerically insignificant, are politically significant. It is plain that Germany and Great Britain acted in concert. Chance could not have produced the numerical identity of their detachments, especially since military units did not enter into the question. We might be equally certain, and for the same reason, that Russia acted independently, were it not that her guard is a military force, and its number may therefore have been dictated by considerations of organization.

JAPANESE PUBLIC OPINION AND THE CHINESE CRISIS.

Our readers would be left under a false impression if we did not record the fact that within the past few days there has been a great deal of strong, and even excited, writing in the vernacular press with reference to events in China. The idea conveyed by a perusal of our Tokyo contemporaries' articles is that they somewhat exaggerate the importance really attaching to the entry of legation guards into Peking. They are evidently inclined to regard the event as likely to be the precursor of serious complications, and they also let it be very plainly seen that, in their opinion, Russian influence counts for a great deal in the set back which the cause of progress has suffered. As usual there is much vague declamation, but the general feeling may be interpreted as a desire for some self-asserting course on Japan's part, which shall enable her to make her voice strongly heard in favour of the maintenance of Chinese independence. The two strongest and clearest articles have appeared in the Jiji Shimpo. That journal considers that, although the forces sent by the Powers to Peking are numerically insignificant, their entry into the city is of great moment, and their presence there will probably be very lengthy. Nothing could have more strikingly demonstrated China's want of political understanding than her consent to such a measure. An era of active foreign interference in her domestic affairs has now commenced. She is closely threatened with the danger of drifting into a condition analogous to that of Korea; a condition preluding her dismemberment. Japan is interested above all other States in preventing that conjuncture. She must make up her mind to prevent it. She must use all her influence to induce the Chinese Government to put an end to foreign interference, and she must resolutely make such preparations as failure in that endeavour may necessitate. Perhaps we ought to note that some of these journalistic utterances are obviously influenced, more or less, by a desire to direct the attention of politicians from party bickerings to foreign policy.

BARON IWASAKI.

It is stated that Baron Iwasaki has made up his mind to retire from the presidency of the Bank of Japan. The reason assigned is that the Minister of State for Finance, in an interview with a representative of a news agency, used language which suggests that the Bank had maintained a high rate of interest for a needlessly long time, thereby consulting its own interests rather than those of the country. Baron Iwasaki naturally resents such reflections on the management of the institution. The Jiji Shimpo, writing on the subject, supports Baron Iwasaki and condemns the action of the Minister. According to the present rules of the Bank, the sanction of the Minister of Finance is needed when any change is made in the rate of interest. The Jiji condemns such a provision on the ground that if a competent man be appointed President of the Bank, he should be trusted to arrange these matters, and should only be required to report his decisions to the Minister. But, at all events, while the law exists it should not be abused, as seems to have been done in the present case. For it is evident that the Minister's object in speaking as he did is to create the impression that the lowering of the rate is due to his interference, and was effected in spite of the opposition of the Bank's officers. He wants, in short, to gain popularity in business circles at the expense of the reputation of the Bank's President. That is the Jiji's view. Apparently it is Baron Iwasaki's view also, or he would not resent the Minister's utterances.

There appears to be no doubt that Baron Iwasaki has tendered his resignation of the Presidency of the Bank of Japan, and that the document is now in the hands of the Vice-Minister of the Household Department. The Baron is said to have called on Marquis Saigo, Viscount Katsura, Viscount Tanaka, and Mr. Oishi, and to have explained to them the reasons of his resolve. They naturally endeavoured to dissuade him, but his determination proved irrevocable. According to some authorities, the explanation he gave was that he differs in policy from the present Minister of Finance, but the truth seems to be that the Minister's recent remarks, made to a news agency for purposes of publication, gave offence to the Baron. They conveyed the impression that a high rate of interest had been maintained by the Bank of Japan for its own selfish objects, in spite of the Minister's protests, and that a reduction was finally effected, not of the Bank's free will, but in consequence of pressure brought to bear by the Finance Department. There has undoubtedly been a great deal of political trickery in the treatment to which Baron Iwasaki has been subjected of late by a section of the vernacular press. It suits the aims of the Cabinet's enemies to deprive it of the active support of a man possessing such wide influence in the financial world, and they have not hesitated to blacken Baron Iwasaki's personal character in the hope of rendering his position distasteful to him. We do not imagine that he has allowed himself to be swayed by devices so obviously insincere which, for the rest, are common elements of political struggles the world over. But it is possible that the equivocal utterances of the Minister of Finance derived a somewhat factitious importance in Baron Iwasaki's eyes from the disgraceful journalistic calumnies by which they had been preceded. We note that the principal Liberal organ, the Tokyo Shimbun, is hostile to the Baron, whose affinities have always been with the Progressists. The fact will not tend to bridge the gulf that is gradually growing between the two parties. That Baron Iwasaki's retirement is a great loss to the public service and to the successful conduct of financial affairs need not be affirmed in these columns. The incident is rendered doubly regrettable by the fact that it constitutes a species of triumph for the unscrupulous enemies of a high-minded and thoroughly unselfish man.
